"It has always been deemed a valuable book for the learning and ingenuity displayed in it relating to the title and conveyance of real property; Coke said it was wittily and learnedly composed; and Lord Mansfield held it to be a good authority in point of law."—1 Kent Com., 556, 8th ed., 1854.

Perkins, Jonathan Cogswell, b. Nov. 21, 1809, at Ipswich, Mass.; was prepared for college at Phillips' Academy, Andover, and graduated at Amherst Coll., 1832. On leaving college he entered the law-office of Rufus Choate, then residing at Salem, and afterwards pursued his legal studies at the Law School at Cambridge, and was admitted in 1835. After a successful practice of 13 years, he was appointed Judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Massachusetts, "and proved himself to be a learned and able as well as just and upright judge,—commanding alike the undivided confidence of the community and of the profession." 1. Perkins, Thomas Handasyd, 1764–1854, an eminent merchant and philanthropist, the founder of several institutions, and benefactor to many more, in Boston, Massachusetts, his native city, wrote, whilst abroad in Europe, and at other times, interesting Diaries and autobiographical sketches, partly republished in Cary's Memoir of his life; and upon this ground we enroll his name in our list of authors. See Memoir of Thomas Handasyd Perkins; containing Extracts from his Diaries and Letters, with an Appendix by Thomas G. Cary, Bost., 1856, 8vo, pp. 304; review of this Memoir in N. Amer. Perkins of an edit. of his Speeches; Mrs. Sigourney's Post Meridian, 4th ed., 1858, 287; E. Everett's Mount Vernon Papers, 1860, 197, 202. Mr. Cary was also the author of several pamphlets and fugitive papers.

Perkins, William, 1558–1602, a learned Calvinist divine, a native of Warton, Warwickshire, educated at, and Fellow and Tutor of, Christ College, Cambridge, first preached to the prisoners in Cambridge jail, and afterwards officiated as preacher of St. Andrew's Church, Cambridge. He was the author of Expositions of the Creed; of the Lord's Prayer; of chap. i.–v. (completed by Rodolfe Cudworthe) of the Epistle to the Galatians; of St. Matthew v.–vii.; of Romans i.–iii.; Commentarie on Heb. xi.; Cases of Conscience; and many doctrinal, practical, and controversial treatises. Several of his works were trans. into Latin, French, Dutch, and Spanish; and their popularity at home is evinced by the number of collective edits. of them, each in 3 vols. fol., issued shortly after his death,—between 1605 and 1634.

We notice: Works newly corrected according to his own Copies, Lon., 3 vols. fol.: i., 1616; ii., 1617; iii., 1618. The last dates which we find are 1626, '31, and '35. Opera, Latin, Genev., 1611. It is not a little remarkable that, in this day of the exhumation of so much buried theology, Perkins's works have not been republished. Yet few writers have been more commended.

"Perkins's sermons were all law and all gospel; a rare instance of those opposite gifts meeting in so eminent a degree in the same preacher. Even the vehemence and thunder of Boanerges to awaken sinners to a sense of their sin and danger, and to drive them from destruction; and the persuasion and comfort of Barnabas to pour the oil and wine of gospel consolation into their wounded spirits. Bishop Montagu preached his funeral sermon, and spoke in high commendation of his learning, piety, and labours."—Brook's Lives of the Puritans.

"He excelled in a distinct judgment, a rare dexterity in clearing the obscure subtleties of the schools, and in an easy explication of the most perplexed subjects."—BISHOP HALL.

"The Works of Perkins are distinguished for their piety, learning, extensive knowledge of the Scriptures, and strong Calvinistic argumentation. . . . The works of Perkins were highly esteemed by Job Orton, though far from being a thorough Calvinist himself."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Perkins's Works are judicious, clear, full of matter and a deep Christian experience. I could wish ministers, especially young ones, would read him, as they would find large materials for composition."—JOB ORTON.

"For his time, his style is remarkably pure and neat: he had a clear head, and excelled in defining and analyzing subjects. His style is highly Calvinistic; but he carried the idea of reprobation too far. . . . His Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians is equally sound as Luther's, but more methodical and comprehensive."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P., ed. 1843, 293, 305.

"His works have been too much undervalued: learned, spiritual; Calvinistic, and practical; . . . holy and evangelical."—Bickersteth's C. S., ed. 1844, 414, 444.

"The science of morals, according to Mosheim, or rather of casuistry, which Calvin had left in a rude and imperfect state, is confessed to have been first reduced into some kind of form and explained with some accuracy and precision by Perkins."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 561. See, also, ii. 508.

Peter of Blois, (Petrus Blesensis,) so called from the place of his birth, d. about 1200 in England, studied at Tours, Paris, and Boulogne, was invited to England by Henry II., and became Archdeacon of Bath, Chancellor of Canterbury, and Archdeacon of London. He came to England probably about 1170, and until the death of this monarch, in 1189, enjoyed great influence in affairs of Church and State; but he was no favourite with Henry's successor, Richard I., and in a letter (Epist. CXLIX.) to his friends at the new court he draws an affecting contrast between his present and former position. From 1191 to 1195 he no doubt found a melancholy satisfaction in the duties of secretary to Queen Eleanor, the widow of his great patron. He is supposed to have died soon after 1198. He was the author of Epistles in Latin, tracts or Opuscula, chiefly theological, Sermons, and Poemata; and there is ascribed to him a continuation (see Rerum Anglia Scrip. Vet., ed. Tho. Gale, 1684, fol., tom. i., 108–130) of the History formerly attributed to Ingulphus, (see p. 933, ante.) It is fair to presume that the continuation is quite as well entitled to the name of a forgery as is the original. See his Epistolæ Select. ad Siculos in Carussi Bibl. Hist., i.; Epistola Duæ in Bibl. Patr. Gallandii, xiv. 633. It is asserted that a work of Peter's on Canon Law and Process has been recently brought to light: see the Zeitschrift für geschichtliche Rechtswissenschaft, vol. vii. 207. For notices of this author and edits. of his works, see Cave; Dupin; Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., Anglo-Norman Period, 366–379. Epistole Magistri Petri was printed at Brussels as early as about 1480; of his Opera Omnia the collection edited by Pierre de Gussanville, Paris, 1567, fol., (reprinted in vol. xxiv. of the Magna Bibliotheca Patrum of Lyons, pp. 911–1365,) had formerly the reputation of being the best; but there has been pub. within the last few years Petri Blesensis, Opera Omnia, nunc primum in Anglia ope Codicum Manuscriptorum Editionumque Optimarum; edidit J. A. Giles, LL.D., Oxonii, 1847, 4 vols. 8vo. This edit. the student can by no means dispense with.

"No other documents throw so much light on the literary jealousies and feuds of the latter half of the twelfth century, as the letters of Peter of Blois, who himself appears to have been by no means free from them. . . . The chief fault in the style of Peter of Blois is an affectation of far-fetched comparisons and allegories, (which was a common fault in the writers of his day,) and the heaping together of a multiplicity of citations from ancient authors, for which he was remarkable even among his contemporaries."—Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit., 373, 374.

Peters, Hugh, 1599–1660, a native of Fowey, Cornwall; educated at Jesus College and Trinity College, Cambridge; after treading the boards as a comedian, took holy orders in the Church of England, and officiated for some time as Lecturer of Saint Sepulchre's, London. From want of conformity to the requisitions of the Law or the precepts of the Gospel, he was involved in trouble which caused him to fly to Rotterdam, where he became co-pastor with the Rev. Dr. William Ames; and in this station, as in his London pastorate, he seems to have used his powerful eloquence and pulpit eccentricities with great effect. In 1635 he emigrated to America; on Dec. 21, 1636, was settled as Pastor of the First Church at Salem, Massachusetts; in 1637 he was elected an overseer of Harvard College; in March, 1638, he was appointed by the General Court to assist in collecting and revising the Colonial Laws; in 1640 he associated Edward Norris with him in the pastorate of his church; Aug. 3, 1641, he sailed for England in company with Rev. Thomas Welde and William Hibbins, the three being deputed to represent to the Home Government "the sense of the colony upon the laws of excise and trade;" arrived at London, he took an active part in the opposition to Charles I., for which, at the Restoration, he was hanged and quartered. He was the author of Good Work for a Good Magistrate, Lon., 1651, 12mo, (in which he recommends the burning of the historical records in the Tower;) a Dying Father's Last Legacy to an Only Child, 1660, 8vo, 1717; and a number of political tracts, occasional sermons, &c. He also pub. Amesii Lectiones in Psalmos; cum Epist. Dedic., 1647, 8vo, (see p. 58, ante.) Concerning the character of Peters the most opposite opinions have prevailed. "Beside him [Bushrod Washington] there sat, during nearly all his life, a most pleasant district judge, Richard Peters, many years his senior, a very good Admiralty judge, but much disposed to leave the watch on deck in all weathers to his sleepless colleague, putting forth now and then for his refreshment some facetia or other—pun, quip, crank, or quiddit—for which he was very famous."—From a pamphlet entitled Bushrod Washington, 1858, 8vo, p. 17, (by Horace Binney, LL.D., of the Phila. Bar.)

See, also, Correspondence of Sir John Sinclair, ii. 71. Judge Peters published many papers in the Memoirs of the Philadelphia Agricultural Society, of which he was President. To him we are indebted for the introduction of the use of gypsum in agriculture. He put forth a pamphlet on this subject as early as 1797. On the formation of the new Constitution, President Washington offered him the post of Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States; but the judgeship was preferred by him. He died on the same spot where he was born eighty-four years before,—the country-seat at Belmont, inherited by him from his father. See An Address on the Death of the Hon. Peters, Samuel. Serm., Lon., 1787, 4to.

Peters, Samuel Andrew, LL.D., 1735–1826, a native of Hebron, Conn., of the same family as Hugh Peters, (supra,) graduated at Yale College, 1757; was ordained Deacon and Priest of the Church of England in London, 1759; returned to America in 1760, and took charge of the church at Hebron, occasionally officiating at Hartford and other towns in the vicinity; disapproved of the American Revolution, and returned to England in 1774 and obtained a pension and a grant for property confiscated by the patriots; pub. in 1785, in London, A Letter to the Rev. John Tyler, against Universal Salvation; elected Bishop of Vermont in 1794, but never consecrated; again returned to America in 1805, and resided principally in New York until his death, which occurred in his 91st year. We have already referred (see PETERS, HUGH) to his History of the Rev. Hugh Peters, A.M., 1807, 8vo; and he published a brief History of Hebron; but he is much better (or rather more widely) known by his General History of Connecticut, &c., by a Gentleman of the Province, Lon., 1781, 8vo; 2d ed., 1782, 8vo; 3d ed., New Haven, 1829, 12mo. This is not considered the most veracious of chronicles. Abroad, the London Monthly Review remarked,

"We observe in it so many marks of party spleen and idle credulity that we do not hesitate to pronounce it altogether unworthy of the public attention," (April, 1782, 252;)

at home, Dr. Dwight (Travels in New England, &c., iii. 495) refers to it as

"that mass of folly and falsehood commonly called Peters's History of Connecticut."

"It contains many statements which are alike apocryphal and ludicrous; and I am not aware that it is ever quoted as historical authority."—JOHN S. PETERS, M.D., Governor of Connecticut: Sprague's Annals, v., Episcopalian, 1859, 191–200.

"Most American readers have heard of the 'Blue Laws' of New Haven, which have been precisely described as making 'one thin volume in folio.' . . . The existence at any time of a code containing provisions such as are quoted above, is a mere fabrication, nor is there any record of so much as single judgments pronounced agreeably to the tenor of those provisions. The anonymous work which first vented the fiction was published in London in 1781, and a second edition appeared in the following year. The author was Samuel Peters, a royalist and refugee."—J. G. PALFREY: Hist. of New England, vol. ii., 1860, 32, n.

See, also, N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1860, 422.

"Among other ridiculously false charges made against Peters is this,—that he forged or invented the so-called Blue Laws of Connecticut,—a charge which is sufficiently disproved by the fact that that celebrated code was in existence and common use before he was born."—A. B. CHAPIN, D.D., Dec. 8, 1857: Sprague's Annals, ut supra, 195.

Petrie, Henry, d. 1842, in his 74th year, Keeper of the Chancery Records in the Tower of London since 1819, in 1816 proposed the plan of a Corpus Historicum, or collection of materials for the History of Great Britain, somewhat on the plan of Dom Bouquet and Muratori. This, it will be remembered, was a warmly-cherished project of Gibbon the historian: see his Miscell. Works, ed. 1837, 834–842; Decline and Fall, ed. 1837, 618, n.; PINKERTON, JOHN. In 1723 he commenced his labours under the authority of the Record Commissioners. Like Thomas Baker, (supra,) Mr. Petrie overloaded himself with materials which he was never able to bring to the press. At the time of his death one vol. only of his work, and that edited by Messrs. Price, Parry, and Owen, had been pub. Mr. Petrie's own vol., put to press (with the preceding) in 1830, was not pub. until 1848, r. fol., £5 5*s.*; edited by H. Petrie, Thomas Duffus Hardy, (see p. 785, ante,) and Rev. John Sharpe. It bears the title Monumenta Historica Britannica; or, Materials for the History of Great Britain from the Earliest Period to the Norman Conquest. Contains: Gildas; Nennius; Bede; the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, with English and Latin Versions; Asser's Alfred; various Chronicles; Excerpta; Descriptive Catalogue of Coins, with Plates; Facsimiles of MSS.; Map of Britannia Romana, &c. See Lon. Gent. Mag., 1851, ii. 628; Lon. Reader, 1865, ii. 340.

Hist. of Europe; T. Moore's Memoirs, 1856, vii. 152; McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 155, 210, 211, 318; Lord Macaulay's Hist. of Eng., vols. i. and iii.; Edwards's Memoirs of Libraries, 1859, ii. 259; Blackw. Mag., xvi. 37; GRAUNT, JOHN. Of his works we notice: 1. Quantulumcunque; or, A Tract concerning Money, 1660, '82, '95, 4to. He condemns the laws which limit the rate of interest. 2. A Treatise of Taxes and Constitutions, 1662, '67, '79, '90, 4to.

"One of the most remarkable of the early tracts in any branch of political economy."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 318, q. v.

Petty here anticipates Ricardo in making the labour of production the test of value.

3. An Essay on Political Arithmetics, 1682, '86, 1751, '59, '83, 8vo; 1687, 12mo. 4. Several Essays concerning the Multiplication of Mankind, and the Growth of the City of London, 1682, '83, '86, '93, 8vo. 5. Hiberniæ Delineatio quoad hactenus licuit perfectissima studio Gulielmi Petty, &c., [with portrait:] Maps [36] of Ireland, being an Actual Survey of The Whole Kingdom, 1685, fol.

"A set of accurate maps."—Bp. Nicolson's Irish Hist. Lib., &c. 1776, 6.

'The Map of Ireland made by Sir William Petty is believed to be the most exact that ever yet was made of any country."—Evelyn's Diary and Corresp., ed. 1857, ii. 96.

6. Five Essays on Political Arithmetic, 1687, 8vo. In French and English. 7. Political Arithmetic; or, A Discourse concerning the Extent and Value of Lands, 1690, '91, 8vo.

"That most elaborate and valuable essay."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 210.

See Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 454. 8. The Political Anatomy of Ireland, 1691, 8vo; 2d ed., entitled Political Survey of Ireland, 1719, 8vo.

"Perhaps the best of Petty's works."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 211.

See, also, Bp. Nicolson's Irish Hist. Lib., 6; Hallam's Constit. Hist. of Eng., 7th ed., iii. 392, n. 9. A Treatise of Naval Philosophy, 1691, 12mo. 10. A Political Essay, 1698, 8vo. 11. Several Essays on Political Arithmetic, 1699, 1711, 1751, 8vo; 4th ed., with Author's Life, 1755, 8vo. 12. Tracts relating chiefly to Ireland, containing: I. A Treatise of Taxes and Contributions; II. Essays on Political Arithmetic; III. The Political Anatomy of Ireland. To which is prefixed his Last Will, 1769, 8vo. It is very difficult to obtain a complete set, or to know what constitutes a complete set, of Petty's treatises; some are still in MS. in the Bodleian Library, &c. We heartily endorse the complaint and suggestion of Mr. McCulloch:

"It is to be regretted that we have nothing like a complete or respectable edition of the works of this extraordinary man. . . . Treatises of such importance and authenticity should not be buried in obscurity. Nor could the noble successors of Petty, to whom much of his talent as well as his estates have descended, raise any better monument to his memory than the publication of a complete edition of his works."—Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 212.

The late Lord Kerry at the time of his death (in 1836) was employed upon a Life of Sir William Petty, to be accompanied with a reprint of some of his works. Mr. Moore had some idea of completing this design, and he was urged by Mr. McCulloch to publish a complete edition of Sir William's works. It is to be regretted that the project was not carried out. See Thomas Moore's Memoirs, &c., 1856, vii. 152, 167.

"One of the founders of the [Royal] Society, Sir William Petty, created the science of political arithmetic, the humble but indispensable handmaid of political philosophy. . . . The benevolent and enlightened Sir William Petty."—Lord Macaulay's Hist. of Eng., vol. i. chap. iii., and vol. iii. chap. xii.

"With a mind capable of just and novel theories."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 454.

But he who would have a just idea of the extraordinary accomplishments of Petty must read the enthusiastic eulogy of John Evelyn, ("neither an unpractised nor an undiscerning judge,"—Lord Macaulay: Miscell., 1854, ii. 298,) who declares,

"If I were a Prince, I should make him my second Counsellor at least. There is nothing difficult to him."—Evelyn's Diary and Corresp., ed. 1857, ii. 96.

"Sir William Petty, who in discourse is one of the most rational men that ever I heard speak with a tongue."—Saml. Pepys: Diary, 27 Jan., 1663–64.

Philips, Ambrose, 1675–1749, a native of Leicestershire, graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, B.A. 1696–97, M.A. 1700, in 1700, Camb., 8vo, also 1703, 8vo, abridged Hacket's Life of Archbishop Williams, and in 1709 pub. in Tonson's Miscellany, vol. vi., six Pastorals, (Pope's Pastorals conclude the volume;) printed in the 12th No. of the Tatler, May 7, 1709, his poetical Letter from Copenhagen, dated March 9, 1709, and addressed to the Earl of Dorset; subsequently translated from the French, for Tonson, The Persian Tales; in Feb. 1712, gained great reputation by his tragedy of The Distressed Mother — little more than a free translation of Racine's Andromaque, but made popular by the interest of the Whigs, and an epilogue of Addison's, ascribed to Budgell, (see The Spectator, Nos. 290, 335, 338, 341;) was greatly gratified, a short time before this dramatic success, by Addison's commendation in The Spectator, Nos. 223, 400, and 523, (see, also, The Guardian, No. 30,) of his translation of Sappho's Hymn to Venus, and of his "admirable pastorals and winter-piece," (the Letter from Copenhagen, supra;) was driven to swords'-points with Pope in consequence of an ironical comparison by the latter, pub. in The Guardian, No. 40, April 27, 1713, between his own Pastorals and those of Philips, in which the superiority is professedly awarded to the critic's rival; was unmercifully lashed by the Twickenham bard in his treatise of Martinus Scriblerus on the Art of Sinking in Poetry, in the Dunciad, The Epistle to Arbuthnot, &c.; hung up a rod at Button's coffee-house with which he promised to settle scores with the satirist when he should encounter him at that rendezvous of wits,—an encounter which Pope very prudently avoided by keeping at a respectful distance from the locus penitentiæ; fell to writing "poems of short lines" in a style of ultra-simplicity ridiculed by Henry Carey, (see p. 338, ante,) and by Pope, as "Namby Pamby," and imitated by Isaac Hawkins Browne in his Pipe of Tobacco; appointed, by the interest of his Whig friends, Paymaster of the Lottery, (in 1715,) and a Justice of the Peace for Westminster; in 1721 produced two tragedies,—(now forgotten,)—The Briton, and Humphry, Duke of Gloucester; in 1718 engaged in the periodical entitled The Freethinker, (3 vols. 12mo,) in which he had the assistance, among others, of Dr. Hugh Boulter, subsequently Archbishop of Armagh, who took Philips to Ireland and procured him the representation of Armagh in the Irish Parliament; in 1726 was made Secretary to the Lord Chancellor, and in 1734 became Registrar of the Prorogative Court at Dublin; resigned his post and returned to England in 1748, and lived on an annuity of £400, which he had purchased, until the 18th of June in the next year, when he died from the effects of a stroke of the palsy. A collection of his works was pub., Lon., 1765, fol., under the title of Pastorals, Epistles, Odes, and other Original Poems. For notices of Philips and his productions, see Pope's Works, Bowles's ed.; Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, with Notes, ed. 1806, Cibber's Lives; Johnson's Lives of the Most Eminent Eng. Poets, ed. by P. Cunningham, 1854, iii. 259–270; Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors, in his Miscell. of Lit., ed. 1853, 180, n., 182, n., 197; Letters of Anne Seward; Bishop Percy, in Nichols's Lit. Illust., viii., 1858, 428.

"Of 'The Distressed Mother' not much is pretended to be his own, and therefore it is no subject of criticism: his other two tragedies, I believe, are not below mediocrity, nor above it. . . . The pieces that please best are those which, from Pope and Pope's adherents, procured him the name of Namby Pamby, the poems of short lines, by which he paid his court to all ages and characters, from Walpole the 'steerer of the realm,' to Miss Pulteney in the nursery. The numbers are smooth and sprightly; and the diction is seldom faulty. . . . He has added nothing to English poetry, yet at least half his book deserves to be read: perhaps he valued most himself that part which the critic would reject."—Dr. Johnson: ubi supra.

"'The Briton' and 'Humphry, Duke of Gloucester,' are not much better than his Pastorals."—Campbell's Specimens.

"A good Whig, and a middling poet."—Lord Macaulay: Crit. and Histor. Essays, ed. 1854, iii. 396.

The reader may feel some curiosity to see one of Pope's complimentary portraitures of Philips as a poet:

"The bard whom pilfered pastorals renown;
Who turns a Persian tale for half a crown;
Just writes to make his barrenness appear,
And strains from hard-bound brains eight lines a year."

Philips, Catherine or Katherine, 1631–1664, the daughter of a London merchant named Fowler, whilst very young was married to James Philips, of the priory of Carligan, and afterwards accompanied the Viscountess of Dungannon to Ireland. During the civil wars her husband suffered in his estate; and it is to this cause that we owe the philosophical lines of his wife addressed To my Antenor. The praises of "The Matchless Orinda" (for she was so styled by her contemporaries) were celebrated by Anne Killigrew, (herself immortalized by Dryden,) the Earls of Orrery and Roscommon, Dryden, James Tyrrel, Jeremy Taylor, who addressed to her his Discourse of the Nature, Offices, and Measures of Friendship, 1657, 8vo, and Cowley and Flatman, who wrote odes on her death. Her epistles to Sir Charles Cotterel were printed in 1705, 8vo, under the title of Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus. Her trans. of Corneille's Tragedy of Pompey (which was several times acted in London in 1663–64) was pub., Lon., 1663, 4to. In 1664, 8vo, some one pub. without her knowledge a collection of her Poems. This she regretted, and especially as they were very incorrectly given; though she assures us that "Should any one have brought me those copies corrected and amended, and a thousand pounds to have bought my permission for their being printed, he should not have obtained it.

After her death appeared a genuine edit. of her pieces, under the title of Poems by Mrs. Katherine Philips, the Matchless Orinda: to which is added Monsieur Corneille's Pompey and Horace, Tragedies, with several other Translations out of French, 1667, fol. The Crooked Sixpence, with a learned Preface, was pub. 1743, 4to. For notices of the Matchless Orinda, see Langbaine's Dramatick Poets; Cibber's Lives; Biog. Dramat.; Bliss's Wood's Athen. And they will long my praise of them survive,
Tho' long perhaps that too may chance to live."

Blenheim, a Poem, in 1705, fol.; and gave to the world in 1708, 8vo, his principal production,—Cyder; a Poem, in Two Books. He also pub. an excellent Latin ode—Ode ad Henricum St. John, Armig., 12mo—dedicated to his patron, Lord Bolingbroke, in return for a present of wine and tobacco. Philips meditated, but, perhaps fortunately for his fame, did not live to finish, a poem on The Last Day,—"a subject," to quote the words of Dr. Johnson, "on which no mind can hope to equal expectation." Of The Splendid Shilling an imperfect edit. was pub., separately, in 1703, 12mo, and another in 1705; a correct edition, in folio, was also issued in 1705; another edit. appeared in 1719, 12mo. A new edit. of Blenheim was pub. in 1719, 12mo; and an excellent impression of Cyder, with Notes, Provincial and Historical, by Charles Dunster, 8vo, gratified the admirers of Philips in 1791. In 1762, 12mo, appeared a collective edit. of his pieces, under the title of Poems attempted in the Style of Milton, by Mr. John Philips, with a new Account of his life and writings. In his new ed. of Johnson's Lives of the Most Eminent English Poets, 1854, 3 vols. 8vo, Mr. P. Cunningham has added to the Life of Philips a Fragment, written by Edmund Smith, upon the Works of Philips,—translated from the Bodleian Manuscripts. See, also, the Life of Philips in the Biographia Britannica.

The pertinacity with which Philips followed up his attempted imitation of Paradise Lost—for he essays it in Blenheim and in Cyder, as well as in The Splendid Shilling—argues a radical defect of good taste for which much greater genius would hardly be accepted as an atonement:

"Philips," says a great contemporaneous master of criticism, "has succeeded extremely well in his imitation of 'Paradise Lost,' but was quite wrong in endeavouring to imitate on such a subject."—POPE: Spence's Anecdotes, Singer's ed., 174.

Of his imitation of Milton in The Splendid Shilling, and in Blenheim, Dr. Johnson remarks,

"To degrade the sounding words and stately construction of Milton by an application [in The Splendid Shilling] to the lowest and most trivial things, gratifies the mind with a momentary triumph over that grandeur which hitherto held its captives in admiration. The words and things are presented with a new appearance; and novelty is always grateful where it gives no pain. But the merit of such performances begins and ends with the first author. . . . [In Blenheim] He imitates Milton's numbers indeed, but imitates them very injudiciously. Deformity is easily copied; and whatever there is in Milton which the reader wishes away, all that is obsolete, peculiar, or licentious, is accumulated with great care by Philips. . . . Those asperities, therefore, that are venerable in the 'Paradise Lost' are contemptible in the 'Blenheim.'"—Life of Philips.

"One excellence of The Splendid Shilling is that it is short. Disguise can gratify no longer than it deceives."—DR. JOHNSON: Life of Somerville.

Tested by its own merits, the verdict of criticism on Philips's principal poem has been highly favourable.

"To the poem on Cider," remarks Johnson, "written in imitation of the 'Georgics,' may be given this peculiar praise, that it is grounded in truth, that the precepts which it contains are exact and just, and that it is, therefore, at once a book of entertainment and of science. This I was told by [Philip] Miller, the great gardener and botanist, whose expression was that there were many books written on the same subject in prose which do not contain so much truth as that poem. . . . What study could confer, Philips had obtained; but natural deficience cannot be supplied. He seems not born to greatness and elevation. He is never lofty, nor does he often surprise with unexpected excellence; but perhaps to his last poem may be applied what Tully said of the work of Lucretius, that it is written with much art, though with few blazes of genius."—Life of Philips.

"The fame of this poet (says the grave doctor of the last century) will endure as long as Blenheim is remembered or cider drunk in England. He might have added, as long as tobacco shall be smoked; for Philips has written more meritoriously about the Indian weed than about his native apple; and his Muse appears to be more in her element amidst the smoke of the pipe than of the battle."—Campbell's Specimens.

It is a curious fact that the poet celebrates the virtues of tobacco in all his poems save Blenheim. A brief criticism upon Blenheim by Lord Macaulay, who with great felicity styles Philips "the poet of the English vintage," (Essays, iii. 488,) will be found in his Lordship's Critical and Historical Essays, ed. 1854, iii. 386–387. 4 A Speech, Guthrie v. Sterne for Adultery, 1815, 8vo; 1816, 8vo. Reviewed, together with Nos. 3, 9, 10, and 11, in Lon. Quar. Rev., xvi. 27–37; also reviewed in Edin. Rev., xxv. 389–398. Mr. Phillips felt aggrieved by the censures of his reviewers, and answered the first-named in (5.) A Letter to the Editor of the Edinburgh Review in defence of his Speech in Guthrie vs. Sterne, 7th ed., 1817, 8vo; and the last-named, in (6.) Calumny Confuted: Speech, &c. for the purpose of Refuting the Remarks of the Quarterly Review on the Character and Conduct of an Eminent Barrister, Dubl., 1817, 8vo. This Speech (Calumny Confuted) was ridiculed in Blackwood's Mag., iv. 213–217. 7. A Speech v. Dillon for Seduction, Lon., 1816, 8vo. 8. The Lament of the Emerald Isle, (for the Princess Charlotte,) 1817, 8vo; 6th ed., 1818, 8vo, pp. 21. He left a MS. poem (extant in 1865) on the death of the Princess Charlotte. It is said to be "formidable and dreary." 16. Speeches delivered at the Bar and on Several Public Occasions in Ireland and England, 1817, 8vo; 1822, 8vo; 1839, 8vo; N. York, 1817, 8vo; Phila., 1818, 8vo. Criticised with severity in Edin. Rev., xxix. 52–70. The critic thus concludes his admonition:

"If he learns to think of his subject; to regard the sense always, even in ornamental passages; to speak plainly and rationally; to use figures only when they come naturally in, and then to use them as not abusing them—we will venture to promise him very considerable success in the arduous pursuit of oratorical renown."—p. 70.

In 1831 appeared Speeches of Phillips, Curran, and Grattan, Phila., 1 vol. 8vo, 1846, 8vo. 17. Address to the Electors of Sligo, 1818, 8vo; now first Arranged and Collected. 18. The 1st ed. of this work was written, Mr. Phillips assures us, in "twenty-two days:" the late eds. mainly consist of matter before unpublished, arranged at leisure. Lord Brougham's opinion of this work (from his Statesmen of Time Geo. III., ed. 1856, ii. 171; see, also, 336) has been quoted in our notice of CURRAN, JOHN PHILPOT, (p. 461, supra;) Lord Lansdowne's and Mr. Moore's opinions were not so favourable:

"1818, Dec. 21*st*. Read some of Phillips's 'Recollections of Curran,' which Lord L. sent me, and which he said was even worse than he expected from the pen of the orator. It is certainly in wretched taste; but to every one who knew Curran there are some things in it interesting."—Moore's Memoirs, &c., ii., 1853, 241. See, also, Lon. Month. Rev., lxxxvii. 74.

The London Law Review (xiv. 166–183: review of ed. of 1851) regards the volume "as equally honourable to the head and the heart of its writer." A review of the N. York ed., 1818, 8vo, by W. J. Spooner, will be found in North American Review, x. 62–82. 20. The Queen's Case Stated in an Address to the King, 1820, 8vo, pp. 32. 21. A meagre biographical notice of Mr. Phillips appeared in Lon. Gent. Mag., 1859, i. 434, (Obituary.)

Mr. Phillips was severely censured for his course in defence of Courvoisier, the Swiss valet who murdered his sleeping master, Lord William Russell, in Norfolk Street, Park Lane, in May, 1840. The censure was revived in the Examiner newspaper in November, 1849, and Mr. Samuel Warren suggested to Mr. Phillips the propriety of his contradicting what Mr. W. believed to be erroneous assertions. This suggestion led to the publication in the London Times of Nov. 20th, 1849, of two letters on the subject between Mr. Warren and Mr. Phillips: see Correspondence between Samuel Warren, Esq., and Charles Phillips, Esq., relative to the Trial of Courvoisier, with Preface and Appendix, 1849, 8vo. See, also, the Times from May 7th to June 30th, 1840; Examiner for June 27th and July 11th, 1840; Nov. 24th and Dec. 1st and 8th, 1849; Annual Register for 1840, 229–244; Minutes of Evidence taken in Short-hand at the Central Criminal Court; pub. by Authority, vol. xii. 216–271; Wm. C. Townsend's Modern State Trials, 1850, 2 vols. 8vo; Lon. Gent. Mag., Nov. 1850, 523–524; Lon. Law Rev., xi. 376–436, (copied in Bost. Liv. Age, xxv. 289–311;) Judge Sharswood's Professional Ethics, 1854; Lieber's Civil Liberty, &c., 2d ed., 1859, 248, n.

The profound publicist last referred to finds himself unable to acquit Mr. Phillips:

"It must be allowed that the defence is not successful, though ingenious."

See, also, Lieber on The Character of the Gentleman, 3d ed., Phila., 1864, 12mo, 68, n. The London Law Review (ubi supra) gives a different verdict. We have ventured some observations on the morality of legal advocates in our life of Bacon, pp. 89, 93, supra. Of Mr. Phillips's remarkable style of oratory Sir James Mackintosh, as may readily be supposed, was no admirer.

"Plunket," he remarked to Alexander H. Everett, "if he had come earlier into Parliament, so as to have learned the trade, would probably have excelled all our orators. He and Counsellor Phillips (or O'Garnish, as he is nicknamed here) are at the opposite points of the scale. O'Garnish's style is pitiful to the last degree. He ought by common consent to be driven from the bar."—N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1832, 448, n.

But Christopher North, a most unmerciful critic, both in his anger and in his sport, has better things to say of Phillips; and one or two of these things we present to the reader:

"Charles Phillips was worth a gross of Sheils. There were frequent flashes of fine imagination, and strains of genuine feeling, in his speeches, that showed Nature intended him for an orator. In the midst of his most tedious and tasteless exaggerations, you still feel that Charles Phillips had a heart," &c.—Noctes Ambros., Dec. 1828: Blackw. Mag., xxiv. 703. See, also, xii. 58; Moore's Memoirs, &c., vii., 1856, 44.

To Phillips was ascribed, we know not with what truth, Thurtell's famous defence read by the latter during his trial for the murder of Weare in 1824.

Phillips, Edward, b. in London, 1630, the son of Edward Phillips, Secondary in the Crown Office, by Anne, sister of John Milton; received his early education under his celebrated uncle, (see p. 1297, supra;) in 1648 became a student of Magdalene Hall, Oxford, where he remained until 1651; pub. a number of books in London, and d. between 1696 and 1698. 1. Severely handled by Thomas Blount (see p. 209, supra) in his World of Errors discovered in the New World of Words, 1673, fol. He charges Phillips with borrowing largely from his Glossographia, pub. in 1656, 8vo. See Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon., iv. 761–762. Of vol. i. he printed a new ed., Geneva, 1824, r. 8vo, 100 copies; again in 1828, (also 1830,) and in 1856, pp. 150, and Advertisement, 4 leaves. As already remarked, (p. 1298, ante,) Milton is supposed to have aided in this work.

"It contains criticisms far above the taste of that period. Among these is the judgment on Shakspeare."—Warton's ed. of Milton's Juvenile Poems.

Of the Preface Brydges declares (and Warton thinks the same) that "the opinions, nay, the very expressions, of Milton break out in almost every page."—Pref. to Theat. Poet. Anglic., 1800, xxxix.

Warton tells us (Hist. of Eng. Poet., iii. 356) that the work "is inaccurate in many circumstances;" and Anthony Wood calls it (Athen. Oxon., iv. 762) "a brief, roving and cursory account." Dr. Bliss has added considerably to Wood's list of Phillips's publications, (Athen. Oxon., iv. 764–769.) Mr. Wood gives no flattering picture of Mr. Phillips,—describing him as "A man of very loose principles, atheistical, forsakes his wife and children, makes no provision for them,"—(ubi supra;)

but, as Anthony on the preceding page calls Phillips's famous relative "that villanous leading incendiary Joh. Milton, his uncle," the admirers of the poet will be disposed to question the faithfulness of the portrait of the nephew.

To Mr. Phillips we are also indebted for a Geological Map of the British Isles, 1842, a Geological Map of Yorkshire, 1853, a Letter in Replies to Essays and Reviews, 1862, 8vo, and Additions (some are also contributed by Prof. Owen and Robert Brown) to the last ed. of his predecessor's (the late Rev. Dr. Wm. Buckland,) Geology and Mineralogy, edited by Francis T. Buckland, 1858, 2 vols. 8vo. By his interesting Lectures on Geology, Zoology, &c., delivered in the principal towns of Great Britain, Mr. Phillips has stimulated many minds to the zealous pursuit of scientific knowledge; and as Professor of Geology in three institutions,—King's College, London, Trinity College, Dublin, and the University of Oxford, where he is also Keeper of the Museum,—and an efficient officer of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, he has also deserved, and we doubt not enjoys, the gratitude of his countrymen.

Phillips, Morgan, sometimes called Phillip Morgan, a zealous Roman Catholic divine, Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, Principal of St. Mary Hall, 1546, was one of the founders of the English College at Douay, and d. there in 1570. He was one of the three selected to dispute with Peter Martyr on the eucharist, and pub., on that occasion, Disputatio de Sacramento Eucharistiæ in Univ. Oxon. habita, contra D. Pet. Martyr., 13 Mai, 1549. He also pub. A Treatise shewing the Regiment of Women is conformable to the Law of God and Nature, Liege, 1571, 8vo. Written in answer to Knox's work, The First Blast of the Trumpet, &c.: see Knox, John; Aylmer, or Ælmer, John. To Phillips also was ascribed the work noticed under Lesley, John, No. 1, (partially reprinted in Anderson's Collec. rel. to Mary Q. of Scots, vol. i.;) and it is quite probable that some copies appeared under his name. Phillips, Sir Richard, Knt., d. 1840, in his 73d year, long known as a London publisher, was imprisoned in 1793 for selling Paine's Age of Reason; established the Monthly Magazine, July 1, 1796, The Antiquary Magazine, in 1807; was elected Sheriff of London in 1807, and knighted in 1808. He was the author of several works, and his name was and still is given to others which were published by him from time to time. Among his own works are the following: 1. Letter to the Livery of London relative to the Duties and Office of Sheriff, 1808, 12mo.

"A bold, sensible, and useful publication."—Edin. Rev., xiii 170.

2. Treatise on the Power and Duties of Juries, and on the Criminal Laws of England, 1811, 12mo. 3. Communications relative to the Datura Stramonium as a Cure for Asthma, 1811, 8vo. 4. "Sir Richard Phillips had four valuable qualities: honesty, zeal, ability, and courage. He applied them all to teaching matters about which he knew nothing, and gained himself an uncomfortable life and a ridiculous memory."—PROFESSOR DE MORGAN.

Phillips, Richard, 1778–1851; President of the Chemical Society of London, and first Curator and Chemist of the Museum of Practical Geology; younger brother of William Phillips, the mineralogist, (infra;) gained great and merited distinction by his contributions to analytical chemistry. He was Lecturer on Chemistry at the London Hospital, at St. Thomas's Hospital, and at other institutions. From 1821 to 1827 he conducted (with the assistance of E. W. Brayley, Jun.) the Annals of Philosophy; from 1827 until his death was one of the editors of the Philosophical Magazine, (contributing papers to both of these periodicals;) wrote the principal articles on mineralogy and chemistry for the Penny Cyclopædia, and published the results of some of his scientific investigations in the Transactions of the Royal Society. See English Cyc., Biog., iv., 1857, 807–808; Lon. Gent. Mag., Aug. 1851, 208; Dr. Thomson's Hist. of Chemistry. In 1811 he pub. An Examination of the Last Edition of the Pharmacopœia Londinensis, with Remarks on Dr. Richard Powell's (q. v.) Translation and Annotations, Lon., 1809, 8vo; in 1816, Remarks on the Editio Altera of the Pharmacopœia Londinensis, and on Dr. Powell's Translation and Annotations, 1816, 8vo; and in 1824 he published his first Translation of the Pharmacopœia Londinensis, 8vo: the 5th ed., 8vo, was issued in the year of his death. The excellence of this work is well known. In 1846 he pub. Observations on the Edinburgh Pharmacopœia, 8vo.

"Of modern British analytical chemists undoubtedly the first is Mr. Richard Phillips, to whom we are indebted for not a few analyses conducted with great chemical skill and performed with great accuracy."—Thomson's Hist. of Chemistry.

Phillips, Samuel, 1690–1771, a native of Salem, Mass., graduated at Harvard College, 1708, was minister at Andover, Mass., from 1711 until his death. He pub. an Elegy, 1718, and a number of practical religious treatises and occasional sermons, 1727–67. See Sprague's Annals, Trin. Congreg., i., 1857, 273–275.

Phillips, Samuel, LL.D., Ph.D., 1815–1854, the son of a tradesman in Regent Street, London, after a short and successful experience on the stage as "Master Phillips, only fourteen years of age," was educated at the London University and the University of Göttingen; subsequently resided for a long interval at Sidney-Sussex College, Cambridge, with the design of taking holy orders; in conjunction with his brother, endeavoured unsuccessfully to revive the sinking business of his late father's Regent Street establishment; in 1841 adopted literature as a means of livelihood, and pub. his first work, Caleb Stukely, (repub. 1843, 3 vols. cr. 8vo; 1854, cr. 8vo; 1862, 12mo,) in Blackwood's Magazine; for two years (1845–46) wrote two leaders a week for the Morning Herald, and contributed to various provincial newspapers; from 1844 to 1854 contributed many biographical sketches and literary reviews to the London Times, selections from which, in two vols., entitled Essays from the Times, were pub. anonymously in 1852 and 1854, (in Murray's Reading for the Rail; repub., N. York, 2 vols. 18mo;) for about a year, 1845–46, proprietor and editor of the John Bull newspaper; from 1851 to 1854 contributed reviews and essays to the Lon. Literary Gazette; was one of the originators of the Crystal Palace Company, for some time its Secretary and Treasurer, and from 1852 to 1854 its Literary Director, and in this capacity wrote the General Guide to the Crystal Palace and Park, and the Portrait-Gallery of the Crystal Palace. One of his best-known tales in Blackwood, The Banking-House, was pub. in a vol., Phila., 1855, 8vo. Biographical notices of Dr. Phillips will be found in Lon. Lit. Gaz., Oct. 21, 1854, 906, (copied in the Bost. Liv. Age, Jan. 13, 1855, 126–128;) Lon. Gent. Mag., Dec. 1854, 635–636; London Times; Bost. Liv. Age, Dec. 30, 1854, 592–597. The Times says,

"The annals of English literature are certainly graced with the names of men of loftier genius than that of this gentleman, but upon the list there stands not the name of a more honourable and upright man."

Phillips, Thomas, 1770–1845, a native of Dudley, Warwickshire, an eminent portrait-painter, in 1824 succeeded Fuseli in the professorship of painting at the Royal Academy, and retained this office until 1832. He delivered ten Lectures, which were published in an 8vo vol. in 1833, under the title of Lectures on Painting: its History and Principles; 3d ed., with 10 col'd plates, 1838, ob. 4to.

"Phillips has much of the sensibility of Fuseli, without his ambitious flights; he has all the practical knowledge of Opie, with a truer, a finer, relish for the lovely and the beautiful; and there is evidence enough before us that his sympathies in Art have, if not a higher, a wider range than those of Reynolds."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Lon. Athen., 1833, 745.

Also highly commended in Lon. Month. Rev., Dec. 1834, 493–505.

Phillips, Willard, b. Dec. 19, 1784, at East Bridgewater, co. of Plymouth, Mass.; graduated at Harvard College, 1810; was subsequently engaged for one year as assistant in a private academy in Boston; Tutor at Harvard College,—first in Latin and afterwards in Arithmetic and Natural Philosophy,—1811–15; studied law with William Sullivan; was admitted to the bar, and rose to eminence in his profession. In addition to the discharge of his duties as Judge of Probate of Suffolk county, Mr. Phillips was employed for a number of years, (1837–41, &c.,) under a legislative commission to himself and others, in reducing the law of crimes and punishments to a systematic code. The result of these labours was reported by Mr. Phillips and Mr. Samuel B. Walcot to the Legislature of Massachusetts, but has not been adopted by that body. The work, however, has had a material influence on legislation and the administration of the criminal law. In 1812 Mr. Phillips was a contributor to the General Repository and Review, (see PAINE, ROBERT TREAT,) had the oversight of the North American Review (Mr. Tudor continuing his editorial labours) during the second year of its existence, and was one of the North American Club, under whose charge it fell in 1817; contributed to the pages of this periodical from its commencement until the year 1834; for some years published and edited the American Jurist; during the war of 1812–14 pub. an Appeal to the Public Spirit of the Federalists and the Good Sense of the Democrats,—designed to promote the war spirit in New England; pub. in 1833, Boston, 8vo, A Treatise on Averages and Adjustments of Losses in Marine Insurance; with Notes made up from the works of Stevens and Benecke; in conjunction with Edward Pickering, edited, in 1834–39, 1st and 2d Amer. edits. of Collyer on the Law of Partnership, (see p. 414, ante,) and the first eight vols. of Pickering's Reports, 1824, &c. Mr. Phillips's separate publications are the following: 1. A Treatise on the Law of Insurance, Bost., 1823, 8vo, pp. 550. Published at the author's risk, as no publisher could be found bold enough to undertake the enterprise. The sale, however, was large. Supplemental vol., 1834, 8vo. 2d ed. of the whole work, 1840, 8vo; 3d ed., 1853, 2 vols. 8vo, pp. 1536; 4th ed., 1854, 2 vols 8vo; 5th ed., N. York, 1868, 2 vols. 8vo. The 1st ed. of this excellent work was reviewed in the North American Review for Jan. 1825, 47–76, by Judge Story; repub. (Growth of the Commercial Law) in Story's Miscellaneous Works, 1852, 262–294.

"Mr. Phillips," remarks the reviewer, (N. A. Rev., xx. 73,) "has done a most acceptable service to the profession by the publication."

Chief-Justice Parker declared that he had found it more easy to get at all he wanted, upon every branch of the Law of Insurance, from this work than from any other on the same subject which he had been used to consult. Chancellor Kent characterizes it as a "work of much labour, discrimination, and judgment; and of indispensable utility to the profession in this country."—3 Com., 431, 8th ed., 1854. See, also, 5th ed., iii., 317, 351.

Blackwood's Magazine in the year after the publication of the 1st edit. (vol. i., 1823) calls for its republication in England:

"It is a desideratum in English law. It is wanted here. It contains the essence of all that has been written on the subject. Principles are extracted, and authorities examined, with a precision worthy of Mr. Chitty himself."—Dec. 1824, 636: A Summary View of America, (by John Neal:) see Atlantic Month., Nov. 1865.

"A good writer, and a sound excellent lawyer," again exclaims John Neal, in the same periodical for Feb. 1825. "His work upon the Law of Insurance cannot be too highly praised."—American Writers, No. V., 199.

Phillips, William, 1775–1828, older brother of Richard Phillips, the eminent chemist, (supra,) was in early life one of the founders of the Askesian Society, and contributed to it in 1801 a paper On the Virgula Divinatoria, or Divining Rod, which was pub. in the Philosophical Magazine in 1802. He subsequently contributed other papers to the columns of this periodical, and to the Annals of Philosophy, and pub. articles in each of the five volumes constituting the first series of Transactions of the Geological Society. In 1827 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. He was author with W. D. Conybeare of Outlines of the Geology of England and Wales, &c., Lon., 8vo, (see p. 420, supra,) and pub. the following valuable works: 1. An Outline of Mineralogy and Geology, 8vo, 1815, '16, '18, '26; N. York, 1816, 12mo; again, with Notes by William Alger, Bost., 1844, 12mo. See Dibdin's Sunday Library, iii. 319. 2. Pickering, Charles, M.D., b. Nov. 10, 1805, on the North Branch of the Susquehanna, in Penna., a grandson of Col. Timothy Pickering of the Revolution, and nephew of John and Octavius Pickering, (all of whom appear in this Dictionary,) was educated at Harvard University, and graduated M.D. at Boston Medical College, after which he removed to Philadelphia. A year or two later he contributed to Trans. Amer. Phil. Soc., vol. iii., N. S., a paper on the Geographical Distribution of Plants, a subject which he has since pursued with great zeal and eminent success. For eleven years he was an active member of the Acad. of Natural Sciences of Phila.,—still engaged in the practice of medicine,—and at the expiration of this period was appointed a member of the Scientific Corps of the U.S. Exploring Expedition. This Expedition returned leaving certain countries that required to be visited to complete the survey of the globe. Accordingly, after remaining a little over a year at Washington, he set out alone in 1843 for Malta, Egypt, down the Red Sea to Zanzibar in East Africa, and thence to Bombay, returning after an absence of twenty-two months. He then prepared and published his work entitled The Races of Man and their Geographical Distribution, forming vol. ix. of the U.S. Exploring Expedition, Bost., 1848, 4to, pp. vii., 447, and 12; illustrated. It has also been republished in London in Bohn's Illustrated Library, edited by John Henry Hall, M.D., 1850, sq. 12mo. While finishing this work, he "made a discovery in Chronology"—we quote Mr. Pickering's words—"in regard to the length and the successive eras of the ending of the 'Great Year;' the Period of Time counted by a calendar year of 365 days. The Egyptians adhered to such a calendar for some 4000 years, and the result is: that the date of every event in Egyptian history has been preserved, and can be recovered; that the date of every event mentioned in the Bible, up to and beyond the days of Abraham, can be equally recovered by means of the Egyptian Great Year; and the same holds true in regard to the earlier events of Greek and Roman history. The announcement and explanation of this discovery were given as 'Chronological Observations,'—the first portion of a supplementary improved Chapter of the Races of Man."

This supplementary chapter,—The Geographical Distribution of Animals and Man,—forming the 15th vol. of the U.S. Exploring Expedition, was pub., Boston, 1854, 4to, pp. 214. Of the Chronological Observations the Westminster Review remarks,

"The proper execution of such a work implies not only great knowledge of natural history, but very extensive erudition,—qualities of whose combination abundant evidence will be found in Dr. Pickering's very valuable essay. We look forward with anxiety to the more general work which it heralds."—July, 1854.

Another English writer styles Pickering's Races of Man

"The best account of the Malay, Mongolian, Papuan, Negrillo, Negro, Telingan, Ethiopian, Abyssinian, and Arabian races, hitherto published, with valuable Essays on the Migrations by Sea, the Natural History of Polynesia, India, Egypt, &c."

See, also, Emerson's English Traits, Lon., 1857, 25.

In 1858 Dr. Pickering communicated to the American Oriental Society an essay on the Invention of the Art of Writing, and in the same year read some notes (since printed) before the Boston Natural Society on The Stinging Power of the Physalia. Dr. Pickering meditates a most important work,—nothing less than "an intelligible account of the Human Family from its earliest traces, downwards in the grand procession of mortality to the present day;" and this, we trust, will not be long withheld from the world.

Pickering, George, and Bedingfield, Thomas. Poems, Newc., 1815, 8vo.

Pickering, Henry, 1781–1838, third son of Col. Timothy Pickering of the Revolution, and a native of Newburg, New York, was for some time a merchant in Salem, Mass., and subsequently removed to the city of New York, in which place, and in various portions of the State, he resided until his decease. He was the author of a number of poetical compositions, specimens of which will be found in Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit., ii. 26.

Pickering, John, LL.D., 1772–1846, a son of Col. Timothy Pickering of the Revolution, and a native of Salem, Mass., graduated at Harvard University in 1796; Secretary of Legation to Portugal, 1797; private Secretary to Rufus King, U.S. Minister at London, 1799–1801; returned to Salem, 1801, and subsequently commenced the practice of the law, in which he continued at this place until 1829, when he removed to Boston, where he was appointed City Solicitor, and held the office till within a short time of his death. In 1806 he was elected Hancock Professor of Hebrew and other Oriental Languages in Harvard University, and at a later day was invited to fill the chair of Greek Literature in the same institution: both these positions he declined. He was thrice Representative from Salem, twice a Senator from Essex, once a Senator from Suffolk, once a member of the Executive Council, and in 1833 a member of the Commission (in which he did good service) for revising and arranging the Statutes of Massachusetts. His best-known publications are the following: 1. A Vocabulary, or Collection of Words and Phrases which have been supposed to be Peculiar to the United States of America, &c., Bost., 1816, 8vo, pp. 355. This work (containing 520 words) is an enlarged edition of a paper contributed to the Memoirs of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1815.

"An extremely valuable work, which ought to be in the hands of every student in the country."—Hoffman's Leg. Stu., 601.

"I wish Mr. Pickering would make a radical lexicon. It would do more than any thing else, in the present state of the matter, to promote the study of Greek among us."—Thomas Jefferson: Conversation with Daniel Webster, Dec. 1824: Webster's Private Correspondence, i. 373.

This is a work of the highest value. We have before us commendations of it by Drs. Edward Robinson, Peter Bullions, S. H. Taylor, (in Bibliotheca Sacra, iv. 196,) Prof. J. J. Owen, Prof. Felton, (in the Christian Examiner, xlii. 137,) and by many other authorities. See notices in N. Amer. Rev., li. 487, (by J. G. Palfrey, D.D.;) lxiv. 373, (by F. A. Adams.) See, also, Dr. Pickering's essay on the Pronunciation of the Greek Language, in Mem. A. A. S., vol. iv.; Moore, Nathaniel F., LL.D., No. 1. Immediately on the publication of the 1st ed. of Pickering's Lexicon (based upon that of Schrevelius) it was repub. in Edinburgh, by E. H. Barker and Prof. George Dunbar, with additions and corrections. In the 1st Edin. ed. credit was given to the American editor, but in the 2d ed. the acknowledgment was omitted, and it afterwards appeared with only the name of Prof. Dunbar. The work ran through several foreign edits., and the American publishers found it to their interest to import 500 copies to supply the demand for it at home. But the 3d ed. of Pickering's Lexicon is indeed a new work, having been enlarged from 900 pp. to 1456 pp., and embodying the results of Dr. P.'s late extensive researches in classical and Oriental literature. Dr. Pickering also pub. An Oration on July 4, Salem, 1804, 8vo; Eulogy on Nathaniel Bowditch before the Academy of Arts and Sciences, Bost., 1838, 8vo, (see N. Amer. Rev., xlviii. 144, 177, by B. Peirce, and Edward Everett's Orations and Speeches, 1850, ii. 263;) Lect. on the Alleged Uncertainty of the Law, 1834, 8vo, pub., with valuable notes, in the Memoirs of the American Acad. of Arts and Sciences; Dr. Edwards's Observations on the Language of the Muhhekancew Indians, (pub. separately, Bost., 1823, 8vo;) Eliot's Indian Grammar, (pub. separately, Bost., 1822, 8vo,—see Eliot, John;) Father Rasles's Dictionary of the Abnaki Language; and the Vocabulary of Josiah Cotton; and constructed a Grammar of the Cherokee Language, (see E. Everett's Orations and Speeches, ii. 118, 139, 257; N. Amer. Rev., xxii. 93, n., 94, n.;) edited, with a memoir, Peirce's Hist. of Harvard University, (see Peirce, Benjamin, supra;) in conjunction with Judge White, of Salem, pub. an ed. of Sallust, with Latin Notes, 1805; the trans. of M. Dupin's Refutation of J. Salvador's Trial, &c. of Jesus, prefixed to the Examination of the Testimony of the Four Evangelists, &c., last ed., Oct. 1867, 18mo, (see, also, Greenleaf, Simon, LL.D., No. 4;) pub. a Review of the McLeod International Question; Remarks on Greek Grammars, from Amer. Jour. of Education, 1825, Bost., 1826, 8vo; and an Address before the American Oriental Society; in the American Jurist, reviews of Williams on the Law of Executors and Curtis's Admiralty Digest, and a paper on the Study of Roman Law; in the Law Reporter, 1841, an article on National Rights; an essay on the Agrarian Laws in Encyc. Americana; ten papers in the North Amer. Review, among which are: Trans. of Wyttenbach on Classical Education, x. 192–206, 412–426, (repub. with Preface: see Quincy's Hist. of Boston Athenæum, 43–44;) On the Pronunciation of the Greek, x. 272–290; On the Priority of Greek Studies, xi. 209–218; Du Ponceau on the Chinese System of Writing, xlviii. 271–310; Egyptian Jurisprudence: Conveyancing, li. 308–315; The Cochin-Chinese Language, lii. 404–423; and papers in Memoirs Amer. Acad. of Arts and Sci., Collec. Mass. Hist. Soc., Amer. Quar. Rev., and N. York Review, (on Prescott's Ferd. and Isabella, April, 1838, 308.)

Dr. Pickering was a man of profound learning in many branches of knowledge, and in the department of linguistics has been surpassed by very few in any age. As a zealous Hellenist, he was constantly adding to his acquisitions from the year 1814 until his death.

"In addition to his accurate knowledge of the Greek, Mr. Pickering had a more or less extensive acquaintance with al least twenty other languages."—S. H. Taylor, D.D.: Bibl. Sacra, iv. 196.

Pierpont, John, great-grandson of the preceding; b. April 6th, 1785, at Litchfield, Conn.; graduated at Yale College, 1804; tutor in the family of Col. William Allston, of South Carolina, 1805–9; commenced the practice of the law at Newburyport, 1812; was for some time a merchant in Boston, and subsequently in Baltimore; in 1816 entered the theological school of Harvard University, and in 1819 was ordained pastor of the Hollis Street Church, where he remained for nineteen years, when a difference of opinion with some members of the congregation resulted in his resignation. He resided at Boston until 1845, when he was called to the Unitarian Church in Troy, New York, and in 1849 he accepted the pastoral charge of a church at Medford, Mass. In 1835–36 he travelled over portions of Europe and Asia. 1. "It has delighted us in the perusal, and we shall often turn to it with pleasure as its splendid images grow dim in our mind. . . . The principal defects of the poem are those of taste; the author seldom fails from weakness, though he often errs in judgment. He has much splendour of imagery, yet we think he often pursues a figure too far. His epithets are occasionally misapplied; . . . his alliteration passes the bounds of good taste and authority."—F. DEXTER: N. Amer. Rev., March, 1817, 408–420.

Mr. Pierpont was a contributor to Goodrich's Token, and is the author of "E Pluribus Unum," in National Hymns, ed. by R. G. White, N. York, 1861. He has pub. upwards of twenty occasional sermons and discourses. Among the best-known of these are Serm. on the Death of the Rev. Dr. Holley, 1827; Serm. on Acts xix. 19, 20, (reviewed in Chris. Exam., xvi. 98;) Discourse on Morals of Political Action, (reviewed in Chris. Exam., xxvi. 218;) Serm. at Hollis Street Church, 1842. In July, 1857, Mr. Pierpont, then in his 73d year, read a poem before the literary societies of Union College, Schenectady. In 1861 he was Chaplain of the 22d Massachusetts Infantry, and subsequently accepted a clerkship in the Treasury Department at Washington, and was engaged at intervals between Nov. 1861, and March, 1864, in compiling in one volume a Digest of the Decisions and Instructions of the Treasury Department to Collectors of Customs, contained in fifty-four folio volumes.

"I regard this labour as a monument of talent and industry, and of inestimable value in conducting the correspondence of the department."—S. P. CHASE, (Secretary of the Treasury.)

Pike, Albert, b. 1809, at Boston, studied for a short time at Harvard College, (which conferred upon him the degree of M.A. in 1859;) subsequently taught school at Newburyport and at Fairhaven, Mass.; in 1831 travelled extensively through the South and West, and at the close of his wanderings became connected with the Arkansas Advocate, which he edited until 1834, when it became his property; commenced the practice of the law, and was married, at Little Rock, in 1834; in 1836 sold out his printing-establishment, and in the same year was employed to supervise the publication of the Revised Statutes of Arkansas; during the war with Mexico served as Captain of Company "C" of the Arkansas Cavalry. 1. 3. The Arkansas Form-Book, 1845, 8vo. 4. Nugæ, by Albert Pike. Printed for Private Distribution, 1854, 12mo. This is a collection of his poems, including the Hymns to the Gods. The Hymns to the Gods, originally pub. in 1831, were repub., with additions, in Blackwood's Magazine (xlv. 819–830) for June, 1839. Professor Wilson appends to them a complimentary notice, declaring that "These fine Hymns entitle their author to take his place in the highest order of his country's poets."

"A series of Hymns to the Gods, after the manner of Keats, which have justly commanded favourable notice."—H. T. Tuckerman's Sketch of Amer. Lit., 1852.

"Here was also published the earnest poetry of Albert Pike, breathing the true spirit of old mythology."—Dr. R. S. Mackenzie: Hist. of Blackw. Mag., Nocles Ambros., 1852, lxvii.

The Ode to the Mocking-Bird, originally pub. in Philadelphia about 1836, was repub. in Blackwood's Mag. (xlvii. 354–355) for March, 1840. Ariel, another of Mr. Pike's best-known poems, appeared in a short-lived periodical, pub. in Boston, in 1834 or 1835. It was written in the prairie while the poet's horse was feeding by his side. About the same time (1835) he published an Indian romance, "illustrative of the habits of the Camanche and Navajo Indians, and of Mexican life at an early period of the incursions by the Spaniards." In 1859 he published The Statutes and Regulations, Institutes, Laws, and Grand Constitutions of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite; Compiled, with Notes, from Authentic Documents for the Use of the Order, [French and English,] by Albert Pike, 33rd M.P., Sovereign Grand Commander of the Supreme Council for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States, N. York, 8vo, pp. 168.

Of his unpublished poems, the principal of which were written between 1831 and 1840, Los Tiempos is the longest. Of his minor poetical pieces which have found their way to the press, the best-known, after the Hymns to the Gods and the Ode to the Mocking-Bird, are Lines Written on the Rocky Mountains, To Spring, and To the Planet Jupiter. The death of Col. Albert James Pickett, (supra,) in Dec. 1858, led to a report of the demise of Col. Albert Pike, and the latter enjoyed the rare felicity—an advance of good fortune beyond even the "happy opportuni'y of death" coveted by the ancients—of perusing glowing epicedian tributes to his own "departed worth." In the next month the appearance at Washington City in life and health of the "deeply lamented" was celebrated by a social festival, the incidents of which have been duly recorded in an exquisite volume (privately printed in August, 1859) entitled The Life-Wake of the Fine Arkansas Gentleman who Died before his Time. To the above we have now to add that in Feb. 1867, Mr. Pike became editor of the Memphis Appeal, and left it in 1868.

Pinkerton, John, 1758–1826, a native of Edinburgh, was for six years a scholar at the Lanark Grammar-School, and subsequently served a five years' apprenticeship in the office of Mr. Aytoun, a writer to the Signet. He pub. in 1776 an Ode to Craigmillar Castle, and on the death of his father, in 1780, came to London and commenced author by profession. From 1802 to 1805 he resided in Paris, spent in that city, often in narrow circumstances, the principal part of his later years, and was there "gathered to his fathers." He was a man of considerable learning, more pedantry, great pretension, and little patience under opposition. His publications appeared as follows: 1. Rimes, Lon., 1781, 8vo; 2d ed., 1782, 8vo.

"There is great poetic beauty and merit in them, with great knowledge of the ancient masters and of the best of the modern."—Horace Walpole to Pinkerton, Aug. 24, 1784.

2. Scottish Tragic Ballads, 1781, 8vo; 2d ed., with a second part, containing Ballads of the Comic Kind, the whole being included under the title of Select Scottish Ballads, 1783, 2 vols. 8vo. Several of these were the productions of Pinkerton's own pen: see his confession in his Ancient Scotish Poems, No. 7, post. See, also, Sir W. Scott's Introduc. Illust., viii. 1858, 99, 108–112; Lon. Athen., 1860, i. 516. The critical canons and orthographical innovations of these Letters, it will be seen, elicited vigorous protests.

"That monster Pinkerton proposed a revolution which would have left us nothing to spell."—DE QUINCEY: see Lon. Reader, 1864, i. 371, (Notes on some English Heterographers, by Henry B. Wheatley.)

The author himself subsequently characterizes it as "a book written in early youth, and contained many juvenile crude ideas long since abandoned by its author."—Walpoliana, 78.

The book, however, introduced Pinkerton to Horace Walpole, (see his Letters, ed. 1861,) Gibbon, and other men of letters and fashion. 6. An Essay on Medals, 1784, 8vo, anon.; 1789, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., enlarged, &c., 1808, 2 vols. 8vo. The author was assisted by Mr. Douce and Mr. Southgate, both of the British Museum. The 3d ed. (edited by Mr. Harwood) was criticised by Barré Charles Roberts, (the article was repub. in his Letters, &c., 1814, r. 4to,) in Lon. Quar. Rev., i. 112.

"This work, though deformed by the dogmatism and self-conceit of the author, is one of the most useful publications on the subject of which it treats."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845, 166.

The author's imitation in this work of the style of his friend Gibbon is not thought peculiarly happy. See an Answer to an Attack made by John Pinkerton in his History of Scotland, &c., by Wm. Anderson, Edin., 1797, 8vo. 17. Walpoliana, Lon., (1799,) 2 vols. 12mo; 2d ed., (1804,) 2 vols. 12mo; 1819, 12mo. These reminiscences of the conversation of the Earl of Orford were originally pub. in the Monthly Magazine. To the collection Pinkerton prefixed a memoir of Walpole. 18. The Scottish Gallery; or, Portraits of Eminent Persons of Scotland, &c., with Brief Accounts of the Characters, Lon., 1799, r. 8vo. 19. Modern Geography, &c., digested on a New Plan, 1802, 2 vols. 4to; (Abridged, 1802, 8vo; 1806, 8vo. See, also, WILLIAMS, JOHN;) Phila., 1804, 2 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., enlarged, Lon., 1807, 3 vols. 4to; 1811, 3 vols. 4to; 1817, 2 vols. 4to. A valuable Catalogue of Maps, Charts, and Books of Travels and Voyages, in all languages, is appended to the work. This book is by no means free from errors, but on the whole it does the author great credit. Major Rennell called it "the best we have;" Southey, in early life one of the most careful of book-buyers, purchased it in 1804, (see his Life and Corresp., chap. x.;) and as late as 1819 an eminent authority characterizes it as "far superior, in accuracy and extent of information, to any hitherto published in the English language."—Blackw. Mag., Dec. 1819, 341.

"Mr. P. has presented us with a production, which we need not be ashamed to own as of British growth, which is not a mere bookseller's job, but is the fruit of the persevering study of a man of letters, and has been conducted on the principles and for the advancement of science."—Lon. Month. Rev.

On the other hand, the London Quarterly Review calls Pinkerton "a mere dabbler in geography," and many pages of the Edinburgh Review (Oct. 1803, 76–80, April, 1807, 154–171) are occupied with notices of errors in the 1st and 2d editions. The last-named periodical, however, (April, 1803, 67–76,) finds much to commend in Mr. Pinkerton's performance. We may here properly state that the last English ed. of Malte-Brun and Balbi's System of Universal Geography was pub. by H. G. Bohn, Lon., 1859, 8vo, pp. 1071, 15*s.* It has an index of 13,500 names. (See PERCIVAL, JAMES GATES, M.D.) 20. Recollections of Paris in the Years 1802–03–04–05, 2 vols. 8vo, 1806.

"We have long known Mr. Pinkerton as a laborious polemical antiquary, and a diligent compiler of antiquarian history in a most absurd and detestable style. We expected something interesting, however, from the Parisian recollections of a man so learned and industrious. . . . Upon the whole, we have seldom met with a more unsatisfactory or fatiguing performance than this."—Lord Jeffrey: July, 1806, 413–421.

21. A General Collection of Voyages and Travels, 1808–14, 17 vols. 4to, 197 plates, £37 16s.; Phila., 1810–12, 6 vols. 4to.

"All the travels, worthy of preservation, contained in the former large collections of Churchill, Green, Harris, and the Harleian, are here reprinted. Many volumes of high price, such as Pococke's and Shawe's Travels, are given almost entire. Translations and extracts of many important travels, not before known in the English language, are likewise intermingled; besides several small treatises, objects of research among the curious, and exceedingly scarce. In this point of view, it is believed that the purchaser of this work could not procure the same collection in the originals for three or four hundred pounds, and some of them, probably, not at any price."—Preface.

"The most valuable collection of voyages extant. . . . The 17th vol. contains a copious Catalogue of Books on Voyages and Travels, and an excellent Index."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 1825, 401.

Many of our readers no doubt highly prize the following work: Prevost, Histoire Générale des Voyages, ou Nouvelle Collection de toutes les Relations de Voyages qui ont été publiées jusqu'à présent, ornées de gravures et de cartes, nouvelle édition, avec des additions considérables, par Dubois et autres, Amst., 1747–80, 25 vols. 4to.

"Mais c'est lorsque l'auteur arrive à l'Amérique qu'on prend une idée avantageuse des améliorations qu'il était capable de procurer à l'ensemble de l'ouvrage. Et c'est cette partie qui justifie surtout le complément que la Duchesse d'Aiguillon fait à l'auteur: vous pourriez faire mieux; mais personne ne pourrait faire aussi bien."

22. New Modern Atlas, 1809–15, in Pts. 23. Petralogy: a Treatise on Rocks, 1811, 2 vols. 8vo. Pinkerton enjoyed the acquaintance, in Paris, of the eminent geologists Haüy, Werner, Patrin, Gillet-Laumont, and Daubuisson, and conversed with them on the subject of this Treatise. It was condemned by Edin. Rev., xxiii. 63. Pinkerton also composed one or two tragedies, never published, contributed to the Gentleman's Magazine, and was for a short time editor of the Critical Review. See, also, Ritson, Joseph, No. 38. After our author's death appeared,—24. The Literary Correspondence of John Pinkerton, Esq., now first printed from the Originals: Edited and Illustrated with Notes by Dawson Turner, Esq., F.R.S., 1830, 2 vols. 8vo.

"A work not only valuable from the character of its information, but also of those whose opinions it unfolds. There is a great quantity of curious intelligence sprinkled over almost every page in the volumes."—Lon. Lit. Gaz.

See, also, Lon. Gent. Mag., 1839, i. 368.

"We cannot conceive in what manner the publication of several of the letters in these volumes is calculated to reflect honour upon Pinkerton's memory."—Lon. Month. Rev., Jan. 1831, 62–79, q. v. for notice of several of Pinkerton's works.

At the sale of Dawson Turner's Autographs, June 6–10, 1859, No. 385, The Pinkerton Correspondence, 700 original letters, bound in 4 vols., brought £32.

A general survey of his literary character, based upon a critical estimate of Nos. 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, and 13, (supra,) by no less a person than Edward Gibbon, will be found in An Address in which the latter suggested Pinkerton as a suitable editor for the projected Scriptores Rerum Britannicarum, or the Scriptores Rerum Anglicarum: see Gibbon's Miscellaneous Works, ed. 1837, 834–842. It will be remembered that the great literary enterprise which Gibbon fondly designed, Henry Petrie (ante) commenced;—and, alas! only commenced. Gibbon perhaps erred in his estimate of his friend's fitness for the proposed task:

"His recent publications," exclaims the historian, "a Treatise on Medals, and the edition of the early Scotch poets, discover a mind replete with a variety of knowledge, and inclined to every liberal pursuit; but his decided propensity, such a propensity as made Bentley a critic and Rennell a geographer, attracts him to the study of the history and antiquities of Great Britain, and he is well qualified for this study, by a spirit of criticism, acute, discerning, and suspicious."—Ubi supra, 840.

But what confidence would the Celts have reposed in the editorial labours of the author of the Dissertation on the Scythians? Pinkerton, indeed, as his Correspondence and his whole literary history abundantly prove, had been at little pains to secure the friendship of his literary brethren:

"The pugnacious John Pinkerton. He was a man of an eager, acute, tenacious temper; a devourer of learning—a very heliuo librorum. . . He entertained or affected great respect for, and acquaintance with, the works of foreign literati; and, assuming an enthusiasm for their learning, indulged his own arrogance by employing their uncivil language, and translating the classical vituperation of menteris, impudentissime, into the St. Giles's dialect of 'you lie, scoundrel.' . . His studious and laborious disposition deserves praise; and the defects we have had to notice with pain, arose in youth from the arrogance of inexperience, and in his latter years from mortification at the failure of a long series of literary attempts—some of which merited another fate."—Sir Walter Scott: Lon. Quar. Rev., July, 1829, 131, 135.

"A man of considerable learning and some severity as well as acuteness of disposition."—Sir Walter Scott: Introduc. Remarks prefixed to the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.

Pinkney, Edward Coate, 1802–1828, the son of William Pinkney, an American statesman, (post,) was b. in London whilst his father was ambassador at the Court of St. James, entered St. Mary's College, soon after the return of the family to Baltimore, in 1811, and remained in that institution until 1816, when he was appointed a Midshipman in the U.S. Navy. In 1824 he was admitted a member of the Maryland Bar, at which he had little opportunity to practise; in 1826 he was appointed one of the professors in the University of Maryland; near the close of 1827 assumed the editorial charge of The Marylander, pub. at Baltimore, and died the ensuing April, in his 26th year. In 1825 he pub. a vol. of Poems, Baltimore, 12mo, pp. 76, containing Rodolph, a Fragment, (which had been previously printed separately for the author's friends, but without his name,) and a number of minor poems, some of which—Italy, The Indian's Bride, A Picture Song, Serenade, A Health, &c.—have been warmly eulogized. A second edit. of his Poems was published at Baltimore in 1838, and they were again pub., with an Introduction by Mr. N. P. Willis, in the series of the Mirror Library entitled The Rococo. A biographical notice of the author, by William Leggett, was pub. in the New York Mirror in 1827; a review of the first edit. of his Poems, by F. W. P. Greenwood, appeared in the North American Review, xxi. 369–376; and another in the U.S. Literary Gazette, iii. 328; and favourable notices of his minor publications will be found in Poe's Literati, 518; Lon. Pinkney, William, 1764–1822, a native of Annapolis, Maryland; was admitted to the Maryland Bar, 1786; Commissioner to Great Britain, with Messrs. Gore and Trumbull, 1796–1804; minister to England, 1806–11; Attorney-General of the U. States, 1811–14; member of the H. of Representatives of U. States, 1815; minister to Russia and to Naples, 1816; returned home, 1818, and elected a Senator of the U. States, 1820. Mr. Pinkney was greatly distinguished for his professional learning, forensic oratory, and remarkable command of forcible and appropriate language. He was certainly second to no one at the Bar of the United States; and in 1816, when he offered to resign his business to Mr. Justice Story, (see Story's Life and Letters, i. 278,) his profits amounted to $21,000 per annum. "One of the proudest names in the annals of the American Bar. . . . His language is most elegant, correct, select, and impressive; his delivery fluent and continuous; his precision the most exact and forcible that you can imagine. . . . He possesses beyond any man I ever saw the power of elegant and illustrative amplification. . . . His style was ornate in the highest degree. . . . Indeed, Chief-Justice Marshall said of Mr. Pinkney that he never knew his equal as a reasoner,—so clear and luminous was his method of argumentation. Judge Marshall then forgot himself, for I should make the same observation of him. . . . One who, while abroad, honoured his country by an unequalled display of diplomatic science, and on his return illumined the halls of justice with an eloquence of argument and depth of learned research that have not been exceeded in our own age."—JUDGE JOSEPH STORY: Story's Life and Letters, i. 217, 296, 325, 567; ii. 493, 494.

Pinnock, William, gained an enduring reputation by his educational catechisms, 83 Parts, complete in 12 vols. 18mo, £2 10*s.*, already referred to, (see MAUNDER, SAMUEL,) and by many other educational works, a list of which will be found in the London Catalogue, 1837–49, or furnished by the proprietors, Whittaker & Co., London. Among the best-known of these useful and widely-circulated works are the Grammars of Geography, History, and the English Language, and the Histories of England, Greece, and Rome, of which three works more than 100 edits. were pub. in all before 1858. The Histories of England, France, Rome, and Greece have been edited by W. C. Taylor, LL.D., of Trinity College, Dublin, and the 46th ed. of the Hist. of England, 1858, has a continuation by Rev. Pintard, John, 1759–1844, a native of the city of New York, graduated at Princeton College, 1775; entered upon the study of the law, but never practised; during the Revolution joined a company commanded by a professor of the college; acted for three years as clerk to his uncle, Lewis Pintard, Commissary for American prisoners in New York; officiated a short time as editor of the New York Daily Advertiser, and subsequently engaged in commerce; was long City Inspector of New York, and for many years, and until the time of his death, acted as Secretary to the old Mutual Insurance Company in the same city. He was the founder of the Historical Society of New York, and the zealous promoter of other useful institutions; an intelligent antiquary, and author of a number of papers in periodicals. Among the best-known of his productions are an account of the city of New Orleans, pub. in the N. York Medical Repository, and (if indeed truly attributed to him) a notice of Philip Freneau in the N. York Mirror, June 12, 1833. A life of Mr. Pintard (we hope that a selection from his writings will be included) is meditated by some of his family; and we trust that the project will not (like many of the kind) fall to the ground. Interesting notices of this scholar and philanthropist, by his intimate friend of many years, John W. Francis, M.D., will be found in Francis's Old New York, 2d ed., 1858, 53–58, 140, 382. See, also, Semi-Centennial Celebration of the N. York Hist. Soc., Oct. 1854; Trübner's Bibl. Guide to Amer. Lit., 1859, cix., cxi.; Hist. Mag., 1860, 367; PAINE, THOMAS.

"Until the career of our founder [of the Hist. Soc. of N. York] commenced, there was little antiquarian zeal among us. . . . He was universally consulted by individuals, of almost every order, for information touching this State's transactions, and the multifarious occurrences of this city which have marked its progress since our Revolutionary struggle."—J. Piozzi, Mrs. Hester Lynch, Jan. 16, 1740–May 2, 1821, a native of Bodvel, Caernarvonshire, celebrated in her youth as "the beautiful Miss Salusbury," was married in 1763 to Henry Thrale, M.P., brewer: in 1764 made the acquaintance of Dr. Johnson, who from 1766 until 1781, when Mr. Thrale died, was an inmate of her family both at Southwark and at Streatham; in 1784 was married to Signor Gabriel Piozzi, a native of Florence, and a music-master of the city of Bath; in 1785, during her residence at Florence, contributed under the signature of Anna Matilda to the Florence Miscellany, Florence, 1785, 8vo, privately printed, and wrote the Preface to and edited the volume, (see GIFFORD, WILLIAM; GREATHEED, BERTIE;) returned to England, and for twenty years resided happily with her second husband at her ancestral residence of Brynbella, in the vale of Clwydd, which she left (passing over her own children by Mr. Thrale) to Sir John S. Piozzi Salusbury, an Italian nephew of Signor Piozzi, adopted by the lady and graced by her with her maiden name. A notice of this gentleman, who d. in 1858, will be found in Lon. Gent. Mag., Feb. 1859, 208. Mrs. Thrale's eldest daughter, Viscountess Keith, (Johnson's Queeny,) d. 1857, in her 95th year, and her sister, Susanna Thrale, the third daughter, d. 1858, in her 90th year. Mrs. Piozzi first acquired literary reputation by some poetical pieces contributed to the vol. of Miscellanies in Prose and Verse pub. by Mrs. Anna Williams, 1766, 4to. Of these, The Three Warnings still maintains its place in Elegant Selections. See Dyce's Specimens of British Poetesses; Leigh Hunt's Men, Women, and Books, vol. ii.; T. Moore's Journal, &c., 1853, iv. 38. Later in life she published: 1. Anecdotes of the Late Samuel Johnson, LL.D., during the Last Twenty Years of his Life, Lon., 1786, sm. 8vo. It will be remembered that Boswell sneers at Hawkins's and Piozzi's anecdotes of Johnson; but Mr. Croker tells us,

"I am, after a close inquiry, satisfied of their authenticity and general accuracy."—Boswell's Johnson, ed. 1848, v. 8vo, 573, n. See, also, HAWKINS, SIR JOHN, p. 803.

"Two days ago appeared Madame Piozzi's 'Anecdotes of Dr. Johnson.' . . . This new book is wretched; a high-varnished preface to a heap of rubbish in a very vulgar style, and too void of method even for such a farrago."—*Horace Walpole to Sir H. Forgotten by the present generation—Lord Lansdowne excepted: see Moore's Journal, &c., 1853, iv. 38. See, also, p. 329. A few years since appeared a little vol. entitled Love Letters of Mrs. Piozzi, written when she was Eighty to the handsome Actor, William Augustus Conway, aged Twenty-Seven, 1843, 8vo. (Some of these are included in Love Letters of Eminent Persons, edited by Charles Martel, 1859, 12mo.) But this is a dishonest publication; in proof whereof, see Lon. Athen., 1859, i. 705, and 1862, i. 50, and ii. 169.

An edition of these Letters, illustrated with MS. letters of Mrs. Piozzi's and Conway's, portraits, plates, &c. was sold at sale of John Allan's library, No. 2322, 1864, for $37.50.

He was the author of the following Latin works: 1. De Legibus, Triers, 1592. 2. De Beatitudine, Ingolst., 1595. 3. De Peregrinatione, Dusseld., 1604. 4. The Lives of the Kings, Bishops, Apostolical Men, and Writers of England. Comprised in four large vols. The first three are preserved in the archives of the collegiate church of Verdun; the 4th only was pub., after his decease, Paris, 1619, 4to; again, 1623, 4to, under the title of J. Pitsei Angli, &c., Relationum Historicarum de Rebus Anglicis, tomus primus: but the running title is De Illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus. It is divided into four parts. Part 4 consists of 15 Alphabetical Indexes,—a kind of epitome of the whole work.

"Though he quotes Leland with great familiarity and assurance, it is very probable he never saw any such thing as his Collectanea de Scriptoribus, but that his only true author, for all that he pretends to bring out of that store-house, was John Bale himself. His Latin is clean enough; and his giving an account of some eminent popish writers, that lived beyond sea in the beginning of the Reformation, is an acceptable piece of service. Mr. Wood has taken the pains to correct a great many of his mistakes, and might have noted some hundreds more."—Bp. Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib., ed. 1776, 131.

"Even the laborious production of Mr. Pitt, corrected by the erudite Wharton, is greatly inferior, both in spirit and elevation of style, to the excellent translation by Mr. Dryden."—G. D.: Life of Virgil prefixed to Dryden's translation of the Works of Virgil.

"Pitt, engaging as a rival with Dryden, naturally observed his failures, and avoided them; and as he wrote after Pope's Iliad, he had an example of an exact, equable, and splendid versification. With these advantages, seconded by great diligence, he might successfully labour particular passages, and escape many errors. If the two versions are compared, perhaps the result would be that Dryden leads the reader forward by his general vigour and sprightliness, and Pitt often stops him to contemplate the excellence of a single couplet—that Dryden's faults are forgotten in the hurry of delight, and that Pitt's beauties are neglected in the languor of a cold and listless perusal—that Pitt pleased the critics and Dryden the people—that Pitt is quoted and Dryden read. He did not long enjoy the reputation which this great work deservedly conferred; for he left the world in 1748."—DR. JOHNSON: ubi supra.

Pitt, Rt. Hon. William, Earl of Chatham. See CHATHAM.

Pitt, Rt. Hon. William, second son of the first Earl of Chatham, May 28th, 1759–Jan. 23d, 1806, a native of Hayes, Kent, was admitted to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, 1773; after leaving college, travelled for some time on the Continent; on his return home entered himself of Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the Bar in 1780; returned to Parliament for the borough of Appleby in 1781, and by his first speech gained an influence in public affairs, which steadily and rapidly increased, until he became, as his father had been in his day, the most powerful statesman of the time. In the many histories of that time must the events of Pitt's life be sought. We indicate, for the convenience of the reader, the following sources of information: 1. History of the Polit. Life of Pitt, by John Gifford, 1809, 3 vols. 4to; 2d ed., 1809, 3 vols. 8vo. Reviewed by Sir Robert Grant (not by J. H. Frere, as often alleged) in Lon. Quar. Rev., iv. 267–271. See, also, N. Amer. Rev., xiv. 146, (by Theo. Lyman, Jr.;) GIFFORD, JOHN. 2. Memoirs of the Life of Pitt, by George Tomline, D.D., 1821, 2 vols. 4to; 2d ed., 1821, 3 vols. 8vo; Phila., 1821, 2 vols. 8vo. This contains only the public life of Mr. Pitt, and that brought down no later than 1793; the author, who died in 1827, promised a continuation to include Pitt's private life, but it never appeared.

"Such was the man whose life has now been written by a person enjoying, in a singular degree, access to full information and who, we will venture to assert, has disappointed the expectations of the public by the performance of the task as signally as his opportunities were calculated to raise them."—LORD BROUGHAM: Edin. Rev., xxxv. 437–467. Partially repub. in his lordship's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1856, 407–430.

"Every thing Macaulay writes is alive and to the point; but if he excels in one thing it is English biography—especially literary and political. No man brings to a focus the scattered rays of historical truth, to place in relief individual character, with such tact as he,—no one is so full in research, so fresh in exposition. We accordingly welcome every portrait from his pen as a vital reality. . . A masterly and condensed political biography, singularly interesting from the men and events here and in Europe with which Pitt's name is associated."—H. T. TUCKERMAN.

"The two speeches and the only ones (I believe I may say it confidently, from my intimacy with him) which he [Mr. Pitt] himself corrected, were those on the Sinking Fund [1786] and on the answer to Bonaparte's Letter, [1800.] The first was a very indifferent speech."—LORD GRENVILLE: *Recollec. by S. Having thus copiously referred to the opposing verdicts of friends and enemies, of censurers and admirers, of this eminent statesman, we should not feel an obligation, even had we more confidence than we possess of our competency for the task, to record any estimate of our own of the political, ministerial, and oratorical abilities of William Pitt.

"His whole training from infancy was such as fitted him to bear a part in parliamentary government; and, from the prime of his manhood to his death, all the powers of his vigorous mind were almost constantly exerted in the work of parliamentary government. He accordingly became the greatest master of the whole art of parliamentary government that has ever existed: a greater than Montague or Walpole; a greater than his father Chatham, or his rival Fox; a greater than either of his illustrious successors, Canning and Peel."—LORD MACAULAY: Life of Pitt, in Encyc. Brit.

"He was perfectly accomplished in classical literature, both Latin and Greek. . . . Lord Grenville has often declared to me that Mr. Pitt was the best Greek scholar he ever conversed with. Mr. Pitt was also as complete a master of all English literature as he was undoubtedly of the English language."—MARQUESS WELLESLEY: Lon. Quar. Rev., lvii. 488, 489.

Considered merely as a member of the social circle,

"Mr. Gifford has justly remarked," says Sir Robert Grant, that "no man was ever more beloved by his friends, or inspired those who had the happiness of living in his society with a more sincere and affectionate attachment."—Lon. Quar. Rev., iv. 265: review of Gifford's Life of Pitt.

"Pitt was the wittiest man I ever knew, and, what was quite peculiar to himself, had at all times his wit under entire control."—WILBERFORCE: Life.

As regards his oratory, (we again quote Pitt's friend and admirer, Sir R. Grant,)

"Every part of his speaking, in sentiment, in language, and in delivery, evidently bore, in our judgment, the stamp of his character. All communicated to us a definite and vivid apprehension of the qualities of strenuousness without bustle, unlaboured intrepidity, and serene greatness."—Ubi supra, 268–269.

We select a few other opinions from the many before us:

"Mr. Pitt conceives his sentences before he utters them; Mr. Fox throws himself into the middle of his," &c.—R. PORSON: Recollec. by S. Rogers, 121.

"In his luminous and comprehensive speeches in Parliament Pitt has explained his motives and unfolded his views, his objects, and his designs."—Gifford's Life of Pitt.

"Pitt, tall and slender, had an air at once melancholy and sarcastic. His delivery was cold, his intonation monotonous, his action scarcely perceptible. At the same time, the lucidness and the fluency of his thoughts, the logic of his arguments, suddenly irradiated with flashes of eloquence, rendered his talent something above the ordinary line. . . . Ill dressed, without pleasure, without passion, greedy of power, he despised honours, and would not be any thing more than William Pitt."—VISCOUNT DE CHATEAUBRIAND: Sketches of Eng. Lit., ii. 277.

This quotation will naturally remind the reader of the many unfavourable comments on the same person by a still more eminent foreigner. Than his there is no better testimony of the position which his great enemy held in foreign courts:

"Pitt was the idol of the whole European Aristocracy."—NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

"Windham most happily said that 'Pitt spoke in a state-paper style.' This is the style of India; and it must be owned that there cannot be a worse."—SIR J. MACKINTOSH: Life, chap. ii.

"His declamation was admirable, mingling with and clothing the argument, as to be good for any thing declamation always must; and no more separable from the reasoning than the heat is from the metal in a stream of lava. Yet, with all this excellence, the last effect of the highest eloquence was for the most part wanting: we seldom forgot the speaker, or lost the artist in the work."—LORD BROUGHAM: Statesm. of the Time of Geo. III., ed. 1856, i. 285.

In his graphic sketch of the imposing convocation of men of renown before whom Warren Hastings was impeached and tried for his long catalogue of crimes, Lord Macaulay remarks that Pitt's

"commanding, copious, and sonorous eloquence was wanting to that great muster of various talents."—Essays, iii. 182.

Again:

"The almost unanimous judgment of those who were in the habit of listening to that remarkable race of men, placed Pitt, as a speaker, above Burke, above Windham, above Sheridan, and not below Fox. His declamation was copious, polished, and splendid. In power of sarcasm he was probably not surpassed by any speaker, ancient and modern; and of this formidable weapon he made merciless use. In two parts of the oratorical art which are of the highest value to a minister of state he was singularly expert. No man knew better how to be luminous or how to be obscure."—Lord Macaulay's Life of Pitt, in Encyc. Brit.

For executive action in "troublous times" he was deemed less suited:

"The price at which he [the first Pitt] purchased faithful service and complete victory, though far smaller than that which his son, the most profuse and incapable of war ministers, paid for treachery, defeat, and shame, was long and severely felt by the nation."—Lord Macaulay: Edin. Rev., Jan. 1834, 542: Earl of Chatham.

"History," remarks his lordship, in his summary of Pitt's characteristics, "will vindicate the real man from calumny disguised under the semblance of adulation, and will exhibit him as what he was,—a minister of great talents, honest intentions, and liberal opinions, pre-eminently qualified, intellectually and morally, for the part of a parliamentary leader, and capable of administering with prudence and moderation the government of a prosperous and tranquil country, but unequal to surprising and terrible emergencies, and liable, in such emergencies, to err grievously, both on the side of weakness and on the side of violence."—*Life of Pitt, in Encyc. Playfair, James G., nephew of the succeeding, q. v.

Playfair, John, 1748–1819, a native of the parish of Benvie, Forfarshire, Scotland, and the eldest son of James Playfair, minister of Liff and Benvie, was educated at the University of St. Andrew's, where he so distinguished himself that at the age of eighteen he was a candidate for the professorship of Mathematics in Marischal College, Aberdeen; in 1772 was a competitor for the Chair of Natural Philosophy at St. Andrew's; in 1773 was inducted into the livings of Liff and Benvie, vacated by the death of his father, and discharged ministerial duties until 1782, when he became tutor to the sons of Mr. Ferguson of Raith. In 1785 he was selected his Assistant Professor (Playfair really discharged all the active duties) by Dr. Adam Ferguson, who succeeded Dugald Stewart in the chair of Mathematics in the University of Edinburgh; in 1805 succeeded Dr. Robison in the professorship of Natural Philosophy in the same institution, and retained this post until his death. In 1816–17 he passed eighteen months in a scientific tour through France, Switzerland, and Italy. 1. Elements of Geometry; containing the First Six Books of Euclid, &c., Edin., 1794, 8vo; with Additions by William Wallace; 10th ed., by Rev. P. Kelland, Lon., 1846, 8vo; 11th ed., by Rev. P. Kelland, Edin., 1859, 12mo; Supp. to, by Duncan, 1839, 8vo. Repub. in N. York and Phila. See Warren's Law Stu., ed. 1845, 170. 2. Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth, Edin., 1802, 8vo. This work, and Playfair's biographical sketch of Hutton, have been already noticed: see Hutton, James, M.D.; Murray, John, M.D., No. 2. See, also, a review of Playfair's Illustrations (by Lord Jeffrey) in Edin. Rev., i. 201–216; Alison's Hist. of Europe, 1815–52, chap. v.; Rain and Rivers; or, Hutton and Playfair against Lyell and all Comers, by Col. George Greenwood, 1857, 8vo: noticed in Lon. Athen., 1857, 1423. A new edit. of the Illustrations was partially prepared by the author; but it never saw the light. The Illustrations were commended by Sir J. F. W. Herschel in Lon. Quar. Rev., lxviii. 201.

"I am charmed by his account of Dr. Hutton, as indeed I was by his Illustrations. In many passages of both I was struck with the agreeable spectacle of the mere force of thought and knowledge, shooting and swelling into eloquence. I have seldom seen more happily exemplified

'cui lecta potenter erit res,
Nec facundia deseret hunc.'"

3. A Letter to the Author of the Examination of Mr. [Dugald] Stewart's Short Statement of Facts relative to the Election of Professor Leslie, 1806, 8vo. See Leslie, Sir John, No. 1. 4. Outlines of Natural Philosophy, being Heads of Lectures delivered in the University of Edinburgh, 2 vols. 8vo: i., 1812; ii., 1816. Vol. i. comprises Statics, Dynamics, Mechanics, Hydrostatics, Hydraulics, Aerostatics, and Pneumatics. Vol. ii. is occupied wholly with Astronomy. Vol. iii.—Optics, Electricity, and Magnetism—was never executed.

"An elementary work of great value."—Lord Jeffrey.

Vol. i. is reviewed in Lon. Month. Rev., lxxxii. 404–415, and vols. i. and ii. in Lon. Quar. Rev., viii. 149–163. Neither of the reviewers indulges in unmixed panegyric. Professor Playfair pub. many valuable papers in Trans. Roy. Soc. London, Trans. Edin. Roy. Soc., Edinburgh Review, and Encyclopædia Britannica, selections from which will be found in the collective edition of his Works on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, Mathematics, and Physical Science, &c., including his Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory, with a Memoir of the author by [his nephew] James G. Playfair, and a Sketch of his Character by Francis Jeffrey, Edin., 1822, 4 vols. 8vo. Lord Jeffrey's Sketch was originally pub. in an Edinburgh paper of Aug. 1819; was repub. in the Annual Biography for 1820; and again reprinted in his lordship's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 977–981. To Lord Jeffrey's pen we are also indebted for the memoir of Playfair in the Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. xviii. Among Playfair's best-known productions are the Life of Matthew Stewart, (Trans. Edin. Roy. Soc., i., 1788; Works, iv.;) Biographical Account of Dr. John Robison, (Trans. Edin. Roy. Soc., viii., 1815; Works, iv.;) papers in Edin. Rev., No. 10, Art. ix.; No. 18, Art. viii.; No. 22, Art. i.; No. 29, Art. i.; No. 42, Art. iii.; No. 46, Art. iii.; No. 51, Art. ii.; No. 60, Art. vi., (these eight papers are all included in vol. iv. of his Works, 1822, 4 vols. 8vo;) and especially the able treatise originally pub. in two Parts (yet left unfinished) in the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica, 1816 and 1819,—now prefixed to the 8th edition of that excellent work, and entitled Dissertation Fourth: Exhibiting a General View of the Progress of Mathematical and Physical Science since the Revival of Letters in Europe. Respecting this celebrated Dissertation, already referred to, (see Mackintosh, Rt. Hon. Sir James, p. 1181, supra,) for which it is supposed at least £500 were paid to the author, it is needless to say much; but a few lines of quotation will perhaps not be unacceptable to the reader. It is thus noticed by the author of the Fourth Dissertation (we quote the opening sentence of his Introduction) prefixed to the Encyclopædia Britannica,—Sir John Leslie:

"The progress of Mathematical and Physical Science during the brilliant period which closed with Newton and Leibnitz, has been treated with fidelity and sustained interest by the hand of a master, whose calm judgment weighed impartially the different claims of discovery, whose powers of illustration could expand the fine results, and whose luminous eloquence was commensurate with the dignity of the subject."

"The opening tribute to Mr. Playfair," remarks Macvey Napier, "of whose history of the earlier progress of these sciences this [Sir John Leslie's] Discourse is a continuation, does honour alike to the writer's candour and taste."—Napier's Life of Leslie, Encyc. Brit., xiii.

Thus another of Playfair's fellow-contributors refers to his Dissertation:

"My late illustrious friend, who to his many other great and amiable qualities added the most perfect fairness and candour in his inquiries after truth."—DUGALD STEWART: First Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

We subjoin the testimony of the remaining contributor of the Dissertations:

"There is no composition on the history of the Physical and Exact Sciences, in our language, which can be compared to that of Mr. Playfair in philosophical eloquence, except the noble work of his great predecessor, Mr. Maclaurin, on the Newtonian Discoveries."—SIR J. MACKINTOSH: Life, i., chap. vii.

"Not only one of the most instructive, but one of the most interesting, publications that philosophy has ever bestowed on the world."—LORD JEFFREY: Life of Playfair, in Encyc. Brit., vol. xviii.

See, also, Lord Jeffrey's Sketch, &c., (supra;) Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 454, n.; ii. 231, n., 411, 412, 413; iii. 197; Morell's Mod. Philos., 2d ed., 1847, i. 90; Warren's Law Stu., 171; Edin. Rev., lxvi. 111, 132; South. Quar. Rev., Nov. 1856, (by Saml. Tyler.)

To the Encyclopædia Britannica Playfair contributed the article on Physical Astronomy and the valuable biographical account of Æpinus. We are unwilling to close this article without special notice of a paper referred to above,—the review of Traité de Mécanique Céleste, par P. S. Laplace, in Edinburgh Review, No. 22, Art. i., Jan. 1808, 249–284.

"There is no general account of the great facts and principles of astronomy so clear and comprehensive and exact, nor half so beautiful or majestic in the writing, as his account of Laplace's Mécanique Céleste."—LORD JEFFREY: Life of Playfair, supra.

"There is [in the Mercure de France, 1809] a translation, with remarks, by M. Biot, of Mr. Playfair's admirable review of Laplace."—SIR J. MACKINTOSH: Life, ii., chap. i.

As regards his general merits as a philosophical writer, few men have been so warmly eulogized by eminent critics:

"Professor Playfair's works exhibit a combination of the soundest philosophy, and of the profoundest science, with powers of eloquence and skill in composition which place the author in the first rank of our classic writers."—DUGALD STEWART.

"He was certainly one of the best writers of his age, and we do not now recollect any one of his contemporaries who was so great a master of composition. There is a certain mellowness and richness about his style, which adorns without disguising the weight and nervousness which is its other great characteristic,—a sedate gracefulness and manly simplicity in the more level passages,—and a mild majesty and considerate enthusiasm where he rises above them, of which we scarcely know where to find any other example."—LORD JEFFREY: Sketch, supra.

Professor Wilson is carried away by no such enthusiasm:

"He was a man of respectable powers and considerable acquirements, and wrote in a clear, lucid style and arrangement. This last was, after all, his greatest praise. That he was overpuffed in his own coteries, there is no one who will not now admit."—Blackw. Mag., Jan. 1826, Pref., xiii., where Christopher does not hesitate to express his opinion on the late eminent professor at some length, and with as much plainness as had before given no little offence: see Hypocrisy Unveiled and Calumny Detected in a Review of Blackwood's Magazine and "Christopher North," by Mrs. Gordon, 1862, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

And, whilst referring, we would also direct the reader to Chambers's and Thomson's Dict. of Em. Scots., 1855, iv. 130–136; Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk; Robertson's Hist. of America, note xliii., and his Dissert. on Ancient India, concluding passage; Lord Brougham's Philosophers Time Geo. III., ed. 1855, 80; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 486; Encyc. Brit., 8th ed., i., 802, n., (by Prof. Forbes;) T. Moore's Memoirs, &c., ii. 155; Lon. Gent. Mag., 1819, Pt. 2, 87, 179, 277, 278; Phila. Museum, i. 193.

"A person very remarkable for understanding, calmness, and simplicity."—SIR J. MACKINTOSH: Life, ii., chap. iv.

One of the latest commentators on Professor Playfair is Lord Cockburn; and he returns to the darling theme with delight, dwells on it with rapture, and leaves it with regret:

"Taking the whole man," exclaims his lordship, "his science, his heart, his manner, and his taste, I do not see how Playfair could have been improved. Profound, yet cheerful; social, yet always respectable; strong in his feelings, but uniformly gentle; a universal favourite, yet never moved from his simplicity; in humble circumstances, but contented and charitable,—he realized our ideas of an amiable philosopher. And is he not the best philosophical writer in the English language? . . . Nothing can be more just than the application made to him by Stewart (Elements of Philosophy, vol. iii. p. 313) of Marmontel's description of D'Alembert."—Memorials of his Time, chap. vi., 1856. Playfair, John. Agricultural Distress, Lon., 8vo.

Playfair, Lyon, LL.D., b at Bengal, East Indies, 1819, the son of Dr. George Play fair was educated at the University of St. Andrew's; subsequently studied chemistry at Glasgow with Prof. Thomas Graham, (p. 716, supra,) and continued his researches at Giessen under the eye and in the laboratory of Dr. Liebig. He has filled several responsible positions; in 1843 was appointed Professor of Chemistry at the Royal Institution of Manchester; was subsequently Chemist to the Museum of Economic Geology; and in 1855 became Sole Secretary of the Government Department of Science and Art, Marlborough House. In Dec. 1868 he was elected M.P. for Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities, over Mr. Sinnton, Conservative. To the students of scientific literature Dr. Playfair is favourably known as the author of papers on coal-gas, &c., in the Memoirs of the Museum of Economic Geology, Reports on the Health of Towns, articles on chemical analyses, &c., and as the translator of several of Liebig's Reports on the Progress of Organic Chemistry to the British Association, (see, also, HOFMANN, A. W., M.D.; JONES, H. BENCE, M.D., No. 5,) and as the co-translator (see GREGORY, WM., M.D., No. 10) of Liebig's Chemistry in its Application to Agriculture and Physiology: see Silliman's Journal, Jan. 1841; Loudon's Garden. Mag., March, 1841; GARDNER, JOHN, M.D.; TURNER, EDWARD, M.D.; WEBSTER, JOHN WHITE, M.D. The last ed. of Liebig's Familiar Letters on Chemistry in its Relations to Physiology, Dietetics, Agriculture, Commerce, and Political Economy, 4th ed., by John Blythe, M.D., Prof. of Chemistry, Queen's College, Cork, was pub., Lon., 1857, p. 8vo; with Addenda, N. York, 1859, 12mo; his Letters on Modern Agriculture, edited by John Blythe, M.D., appeared, Lon., 1859, p. 8vo; N. York, 1859, 12mo; and his Natural Laws of Husbandry, edited by John Blythe, M.D., was published, Lon., 1863, 8vo; N. York, 1863, 12mo.

To Dr. Playfair's publications should be added, On the Importance of Studying Abstract Science, &c., Lon., 1849, 8vo; On the Food of Man in Relation to his Useful Work, Edin., 1865, 8vo; The Cattle-Plague in its Relation to Past Epidemics and to the Present Attack, 1866, fp. 8vo.

To the Great Exhibition of 1851 Dr. Playfair rendered important services, which added to his well-earned reputation in the walks of practical science, and procured him the honour of the title of Companion of the Bath, and the position of Gentleman Usher in the Household of Prince Albert. In 1858 he was appointed Professor of Chemistry and Chemical Pharmacy in the University of Edinburgh. In 1862 he had charge of the Department of Juries in the London Exhibition.

Plowden, Rev. Charles, b. in England, 1743; became a Jesuit, 1759; was made President of the R. Catholic College of Stonyhurst, Lancashire; d. at Jougue, Franche-Comté, when returning to England from Rome, 1821. He was a zealous advocate of the proposed organization of the Jesuits in England, and defended his views on that subject against C. Butler and J. Berington. 1. Remarks on the Writings of J. Plowden, Edmund, 1517–1585, a member of an ancient Shropshire family; studied arts, philosophy, and physic for three years at Cambridge; began the study of the common law in the Middle Temple, 1539; removed to Oxford and devoted himself for four years to his books, and was there admitted to the practice of physic and surgery; returned to his "jealous mistress," and so zealously atoned for past neglect that he was made Summer Reader in the Middle Temple, 1557, Sergeant-at-Law, 1558, and Lent Reader, 1560. The name of Plowden is dear to all lawyers on account of his excellent collection entitled Les Commentaries ou Reports de divers Cases, esteants matters en ley, et de les arguments sur y ceux, en les temps des raignes les Roy Ed. les size, les Roigne Mary, le Roy et Roigne Ph. and Mary; et les Roigne Elizabeth. In French, Part 1, pub. Lon., 1571, fol.; both Parts subsequently in 1 vol. fol., as follows: 1578, 1584, 1588, 1599, 1613, 1684. Abridgment in French, by T. A., [Thomas Ashe,] 1607, 12mo. A trans. into English of this Abridgment, by Fabian Hicks, was pub., 1650, 1659, 12mo. There was also pub. in 1662, 12mo, an English trans. of Plowden's Quæries, (which will be found in French, appended to the last French ed. of the Commentaries, 1684, fol.,) under the title of Quæries; or, A Moot Book for Young Students Methodized, &c. by H. B. Plowden's Commentaries (trans. and edited by Mr. Broomly) appeared in English, with valuable References and the Quæries, in 1760, fol., and were repub., 1769, 2 vols. 8vo; 1779, fol.; Dubl., 1792, 2 vols. 8vo; Lon., 1816, 2 vols. 8vo. Plowden excuses himself (very needlessly) for printing his Commentaries, on the groun l that his MSS. had been often incorrectly copied by those to whom he lent them: see his Preface. The excellence of Plowden's collection has been the theme of learned eulogists from his own day to ours,—from Lord Coke to Chancellor Kent.

"Plowden's Commentaries embraced the same period as the reports of Dyer. [See DYER, DIER, or DEYER, SIR JAMES, ante.] They bear as high a reputation for accuracy as any ancient book of reports. . . . The work is . . . exceedingly interesting and instructive, by the evidence it affords of the extensive learning, sound doctrine, and logical skill of the ancient English bar."—1 Kent Com., 535, 8th ed., 1854.

The Protestants Camden and Fuller agree in commending this excellent Roman Catholic lawyer:

"Ut in juris Anglicani scientia," exclaims the first, "de qua scriptis bene meruit, facile princeps; ita vitæ integritate inter homines suæ professionis nulli secundus."—Annal. Reg. Elizab., 1584.

"And how excellent a medley is made," moralizes the quaint historian of the Worthies, after quoting the last line of Camden's eulogy, "when honesty and ability meet in a man of his profession!"—Worthies, ed. 1840, iii. 61.

Plowden, Mrs. Frances, d. 1827, wife of the succeeding. Virginia; a Comic Opera, 1800, 8vo.

Plowden, Francis, LL.D., a Roman Catholic and a member of the English Chancery Bar, d. at Paris, 1829, at an advanced age, brother to Rev. Charles Plowden, (supra,) and father-in-law to the Earl of Dundonald, (see COCHRANE, ARCHIBALD,) was the author of a number of political, legal, and historical works, of which we notice: 1. The Case Stated, Lon., 1791, 8vo. 2. Jura Anglorum: the Rights of Englishmen, &c., 1792, 8vo.

"Of great erudition, and for the ability of the execution, as well as for the intention, of great merit."—BISHOP HORSLEY: Serms., XLV.

It was answered in A Letter to Francis Plowden, &c., by a R. Catholic Clergyman, 1794, 8vo. This Letter is commended, with qualifications, in Lon. Month. Rev., 1794, ii. 261. 3. See No. 13. This work was reviewed in the Brit. Critic by Sir Richard Musgrave, (p. 1395, supra,) and his critique, with additions, &c., was pub. in a pamphlet, Lon., 1804, 8vo, under the title of Strictures upon a Historical Review, &c. Noticed in Lon. Gent. Mag., lxxiv. 662. Dr. Plowden pub. in reply two pamphlets: 9. A Postliminious Preface to the Historical Review, &c., 1804, 4to. 10. An Historical Letter to Sir Richard Musgrave, &c., 1805, 8vo. Nos. 8 and 9 were reviewed unfavourably in Edin. Rev., v. 152–167. Mr. Hallam (Constit. Hist. of Eng., 7th ed., 1854, iii. 387, n.) pronounces the Historical Review "unfair and superficial;" and a nother eminent critic calls the work (including the Postliminious Preface)

"A confused, unwieldy pamphlet, in three volumes quarto; but a repository of dreadful and damning proof against the English government of Ireland."—Life of Sir J. Mackintosh, i., chap. ix.

Plunket, Rt. Hon. William Conyngham, Lord, 1768–1854, a native of Enniskillen, Ireland, where his father, Rev. Thomas Plunket, was a Presbyterian minister, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; called to the Irish Bar, 1787, and immediately took a seat in the Irish House of Commons; Solicitor-General for Ireland, 1803, and Attorney-General, 1805–7; entered the British House of Commons, 1807; and there for fifteen years maintained an almost unequalled reputation for eloquence of the highest order; reappointed Attorney for Ireland, 1822, and held the post until 1827; created a peer of the United Kingdom, 1827, and in the same year made Lord Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas in Ireland, an office which he retained until 1830; Lord Chancellor of Ireland, 1830–41. From 1841 Lord Plunket withdrew from public life, and passed his closing years at his seat, Old Connaught, co. Wicklow. Shortly before his death he commenced the preparation of a collection of his speeches, intended for publication; but the work was left unfinished, and, indeed, he destroyed his papers. Since his death there has been pub. a collection (the first and only one) of his Speeches at the Bar and in the Senate; edited, with a Memoir and Historical Notices, by J. C. Hoey, Dubl., 1856. Everett, has been already cited, (see PHILLIPS, CHARLES, ante,) and it will be observed that he made the same remark (see his Life, vol. ii., chap. vii.) to George Moore. See, also, Rush's Narrative of a Residence at the Court of London, Second Series. Our narrow limits forbid us to fortify the verdict of Sir James by copious citations to the same effect.

"His great fame rests upon his eloquence, in which he was surpassed by none in his own time, hardly by any orator of former ages."—LORD BROUGHAM: States. Time Geo. III., 335.

"Mr. Plunket, the greatest accession to parliamentary debaters that many years had produced, exerted a species of commanding eloquence and close reasoning in favour of concession to Roman Catholics which the House, already enriched with genius and talent from Ireland, had never yet witnessed from that country."—LORD HOLLAND: Memoir of the Whig Party, vol. ii.

"Lord Plunket was, in my opinion, the most powerful and able advocate the Catholics ever had. I will say that he, more than any other man, contributed to the success of the Roman Catholic Question."—SIR ROBERT PEEL.

The testimony of Mr. Canning (who duly appreciated the services to the same cause of Grattan, O'Connell, and Sydney Smith) is to the same effect. Perhaps Mr. Plunket's greatest speech on the Roman Catholic Question was delivered February 28th, 1821, (that which followed his motion regarding Catholic Emancipation,) which proved him, exclaimed Sir James Mackintosh, "the greatest master of eloquence and reasoning then existing in public life," and made it evident, remarks Sir Archibald Alison, "that if the mantle of Romilly had descended on Mackintosh, that of Grattan had fallen on the shoulders of Plunket." (Hist. of Europe, 1815–52, ii. 472.)

After his lordship's death, in 1854, a Memoir of his Life was promised,—to be written by Mr. Edward Berwick, President of Queen's College, Galway, and the grand-nephew of Grattan; but it would seem that this is to be one of the large class of books announced "in haste" and completed "at leisure"—or not at all. Pocock, Edward, D.D., 1604–1691, a native of Oxford, entered of Magdalene Hall, Oxford, 1618; elected to a Scholarship of Corpus Christi College, 1620; B.A., 1622; Fellow, 1628; ordained priest, 1629; Chaplain to the English Factory at Aleppo, where he diligently studied the Arabic and other Eastern languages, 1630–36; first Prof. of Laud's Arabic Lecture at Oxford, 1636, and soon after, at Laud's request, embarked for Constantinople, where he resided, collecting ancient MSS., until 1640; Rector of Childrey, Berkshire, 1643; Hebrew Prof. at Oxford and Canon of Christ Church, 1648; ejected from his Canonry, 1650, but restored at the Restoration in 1660. In 1655 this great scholar was threatened by the Parliamentary Commissioners with the loss of his Hebrew and Arabic Professorships; but this disgrace to the Roundhead party was happily prevented by the determined opposition of Drs. John Owen, (himself one of the Commissioners,) Seth Ward, John Wilkins, and John Wallis, who withstood the stupid and bigoted creatures to their face, and made them sensible of "the infinite contempt and reproach" which would reward such treatment of a man "whom all the learned, not of England only, but of all Europe, so justly admired for his vast knowledge and extraordinary accomplishments." For a detailed account of the life, translations into Arabic, and other publications, of Pocock, we refer to the excellent biography of Leonard Twells, (infra,) and the authorities cited below. We notice: 1. Versio et Notæ ad IV. Epistolas, Syriace, &c., Lugd. Bat., 1630, 4to. 2. Specimen Historiæ Arabum, &c., Oxon., 1648, '50, 4to. Commended by Prideaux, Ockley, Selden, Reland, &c.

Whatever can now be known of the idolatry of the ancient Arabians may be found in Pocock, (Specimen, p. 89–136, 163, 164.) His profound erudition is more concisely interpreted by Sale, (Preliminary Dissertation, p. 14–24,) and Assemanni (Bibliot. Orient., tom. iv. p. 580–590) has added some valuable remarks. . . . Poe, A. S. To Love and to be Loved; a Story, N. York, 1851, 12mo.

Poe, Edgar Allan, 1811–1849, a native of Baltimore, the grandson of David Poe, a soldier of the American Revolution, and a son of David and Elizabeth Arnold Poe, of the theatre, by the death of his parents in 1815 was left with his brother Henry and sister Rosalie in a state of "homeless poverty." Adopted by a kind-hearted merchant, Mr. Allan, of Baltimore, he was in 1816 placed at a school near London, and in 1822 removed to the University of Virginia, where he was equally distinguished as a scholar, an athlete, and a debauchee. In the first-named capacity he elicited the respect of his tutors, in the second the envy and admiration of his class-mates; in the third he offended the academical authorities and was expelled from the college. The refusal of Mr. Allan to provide funds for losses at the gambling-table aroused the ire of his reckless ward, and he determined to follow the example of his noble fellow-poet, Lord Byron, and aid the Greeks in their struggle for political and religious liberty. He never reached Athens, but in about a year after his departure from America was shipped home from St. Petersburg through the good offices of the American minister, Mr. Henry Middleton. Mr. Allan—whose long-suffering and endurance of Poe's waywardness will remind the reader of good Uncle Contarine's trials with Oliver Goldsmith,—see pp. 688–689, supra—again opened his arms to the prodigal, and placed him as a student at the Military Academy at West Point. The strict discipline of this excellent institution was by no means suited either to the temper or habits of the new cadet, and in less than a twelvemonth he received a significant intimation of the propriety of a change of residence. Poe again presented himself before Mr. Allan's door, and was again received into a household from which, for some unexplained offence, he was shortly to be ejected forever. Poe tells us that the cause of his dismission was the hostility engendered by his ridicule of Mr. Allan's choice in taking to his bosom (whilst Poe was at West Point) a wife too young in years to be a fitting successor to the first Mrs. Allan. But this would have been so slight an offence, compared with the ordinary character of Poe's transgressions, that it may be presumed the relief would have been agreeable to his benefactor. Neither the old husband (though Allan indeed was not an old husband) nor the young wife, in these ill-assorted unions, is apt to be offended with a little raillery on the score of disparity. In such cases both are victors, and the conquest of youth and of experience respectively may be considered about equipollent. Thrown now entirely upon his own resources, Poe determined to be of the number of those whose motto is "Tenui musam meditamur avena," ("we cultivate literature on a little oatmeal,") and he had, indeed, already solicited the attention of the public by a poetical pamphlet (pp. 71, 8vo) pub. at Baltimore in 1829, entitled Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane, and Minor Poems. (See Philobiblion, N. York, Nos. 2 and 4.) Some of these verses, written in his 16th, 17th, and 18th years, are thought to display powers of no ordinary cast. In 1833 he gained (by means of his beautiful chirography) a prize offered by the Baltimore Saturday Visitor by his tale entitled A Manuscript found in a Bottle; and May, 1835, to January, 1837, he edited the Southern Literary Messenger, pub. at Richmond. Whilst residing in this city, he married his cousin, Virginia Clemm. The lady survived the union about ten years; but the self-sacrificing devotion of her mother watched over the erring husband and the reckless widower until his latest hour, and then left the dead to bravely fight in vindication of that character from the irregularities of which she had long been the greatest sufferer. In 1837 Poe removed to Baltimore, then to Philadelphia, and at the close of the same year we find him in New York, and a contributor to the New York Review. In 1838 he pub. in book-form, with a continuation, a story commenced in the Southern Literary Messenger, entitled The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym, of Nantucket, N York, 12mo; repub. with Stories of Humour, and a few Essays, 1856, 12mo; repub. separately, Lon., Dec. 1861, fp. 8vo.

In the same year he returned to Philadelphia, and from May, 1839, to June, 1840, he discharged the editorial duties connected with Burton's Gentleman's Magazine. It was in the latter year that he gave to the world a collection of all the prose stories he had then written, under the title of Tales of the Grotesque and the Arabesque, Phila., 2 vols. 12mo. From November, 1840, to about April, 1842, he was editor of Graham's Magazine; in the spring of 1843 he gained a prize of $100 by his story of The Gold Bug, pub. in the Dollar Newspaper of Philadelphia. In this city, also, he proposed the publication of a monthly periodical to be called The Penn Magazine; on further thoughts he preferred the title of The Stylus; but the project got no further than the prospectus. In the autumn of 1844 he again removed to New York, where the fame of his tales of The Descent into the Mælstrom, The Premature Burial, The Purloined Letter, The Murders of the Rue Morgue, and (the sequel of the last) The Mystery of Marie Roget had revived the public curiosity respecting their author. This interest was redoubled in February of the next year by the publication, in the second number of Colton's Whig Review, of the poem of the Raven,—Poe's best-known production. In the same year, (1845,) after a six months' engagement with Willis and Morris as assistant editor of the Mirror, he became associated with Mr. Charles F. Briggs and Mr. Watson in the editorial management of the Broadway Journal. In October, 1845, this periodical passed entirely into his possession, and, as might have been surmised, it did not long survive the connection: the last number was pub. January 3d, 1846. Again left at liberty, he contributed to Godey's Lady's Book, May to November, 1846, a series of six papers entitled The Literati of New York City. They were pub. collectively, with additional sketches, together with Marginalia, Suggestions, and Essays, with a Sketch of the Author by R. W. Griswold, in a 12mo vol., pp. 607, N. York, 1850. This vol. is the third in the collective eds. of Poe's Works pub. by Redfield, 1856, 4 vols. 12mo. In the autumn and winter of 1846 (he was living at Fordham, a few miles from the city of New York) Poe's necessities elicited a generous appeal from a generous man,—N. P. Willis, in the Home Journal,—and a substantial response for a time relieved the res angusta domi,—which yet Poe was too proud to admit, and, indeed, denied in a remarkable letter pub. in the Home Journal, Dec. 30, 1846. In a few weeks after this date, a sick and suffering yet a loved and loving wife was removed from greater "evil to come." In February, 1848, Poe delivered at the Society Library in New York a lecture on the Cosmogony of the Universe, which he pub. in the same year under the title of Eureka, or The Universal, a Prose Poem, N. York, 12mo, pp. 144. It was reviewed in the (New York) Literary World, July 29, 1848, and in the ensuing September (20th) Poe pub. in the same periodical a letter addressed to C. F. Hoffman, the editor, in which he attacks his critic with more vigour than politeness. Shortly after this he became engaged to be married to "one of the most brilliant women of New England;" but the prospective groom took effective measures to prevent the consummation of the treaty, and the lady, thoroughly disenchanted, released the gentleman from the engagement,—if not without tears, certainly without regret. A few months later we find him again betrothed, and this time to a friend of his early youth; but exposure to the night air, resulting from the debility of intoxication, brought on a raging fever, of which he died, after two days' illness, at the Baltimore Hospital, October 7, 1849, at the age of thirty-eight years. This is but a sad story; and we should have liked it better ourselves had it told more of virtue and less of vice and of the deplorable fruits of transgression. But to have told aught but the truth would have proved us unfaithful chroniclers. That we have told less than the whole truth, or alleged truth, many of our readers can affirm,—and none better than those who are familiar with the remarkable record in which Poe's "literary executor," Dr. Griswold, has embalmed the least creditable points of his friend's character.

Mr. Willis says,—and we quote the words from a sense of justice,—

"We have heard, from one who knew him well, what should be stated in all mention of his lamentable irregularities,—that with a single glass of wine his whole nature was reversed; the demon became uppermost, and, though none of the usual signs of intoxication were visible, his will was palpably insane."

Mrs. Osgood bears testimony to his "Christian, graceful, and almost tender reverence for all women who won his respect," and to "the charming love and confidence that existed between his wife and himself," (letter to Dr. Griswold;) and the mother of that wife declares that "he was more than a son to myself, in his long-continued and affectionate observance of every duty to me."

There have been pub. the following collections of Poe's productions: 1. Tales, N. York, 1845, 12mo; 1849, 12mo. 2. Tales of Mystery, Imagination, and Humour; and Poems, Lon., 1852, 2 vols. 12mo. Complete Poetical Works, with a Selection of his Sketches and Reviews, Lon., 1866, fp. 8vo. See, also, The Raven Illustrated, by David Scattergood, (with a portion of the poem set to music,) Phila., 1866. Prose Tales, First Series, N. York, 1866, 12mo; Second Series, 1866, 12mo. An edition of Poe's Works was published in Australia in 1868; and a new edition of Poetical Works, on toned paper, with portrait and illustrated frontispiece to the Raven, by John Tenniel, is now (1869) in preparation by W. J. Widdleton, New York. There is a book in the market, entitled The Conchologist's First Book, by Edgar A. Poe, Phila., 18mo. This is in fact an almost verbatim reprint of Captain Thomas Brown's Text-Book of Conchology, Glasgow, 1833. We do not choose to dwell on the story. It will be found in the International Magazine, Oct. 1850, (340, n.,) in which number was republished Griswold's Memoir of his late friend. On pp. 167–168 occurs a notice of Poe's writings from Fraser's Magazine. Another article on Poe from Fraser's Mag. will be found in Bost. Liv. Age, liv. 150–164; and other notices of the man and author, in Irish Quar. Rev., v. 564; Edin. Rev., June, 1857; Blackw. Mag., lxii. 582; Lon. Athen., 1857, 818; 1859, Pt. 1, 746; N. Amer. Lit., 1855, xvii.; 1859, v., lix.; Keddie's Cyc. of Lit., &c.; Lowell's Fable for Critics; Wallace's Literary Criticisms; Notes and Q., 1864, ii., Index. A new memoir of Poe, by his friend Mr. Thomas C. Clarke, of Philadelphia, to be illustrated by letters as yet unpublished, has been for some time announced.

"Poe," remarks Mr. Gilfillan, "is distinguished by many styles and many manners. He is the author of fictions as matter-of-fact in their construction and language as the stories of Defoe, and of tales as weird and wonderful as those of Hoffman; of amatory strains trembling, if not with heart, with passion, and suffused with the purple glow of love, and of poems, dirges either in form or in spirit, into which the genius of desolation has shed its dreariest essence; of verses gay with apparent but shallow joy, and of others dark with a misery which reminds us of the helpless, hopeless, infinite misery which sometimes visits the soul in dreams."—Third Gallery of Lit. Port.

"The flow of all Poe's verse is remarkable for ease and gracefulness: it is hardly ever hampered by the difficulties of rhyme and rhythm which exist to a great degree in the metres of which he makes use. . . . A perusal of his critical essays leads us to the belief that his ability did not at all lie in that way. They are almost entirely taken up by minute verbal fault-finding: there is hardly any thing like the discussion of principles; and many of the papers are evidently dictated by personal spite, and afford us a very unfavourable notion of the tone of American journalism. [See our comments, p. 1125, ante, Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth.] But Poe's great power lay in writing tales, which rank in a class by themselves and have their characteristics strongly defined."—Fraser's Mag.; copied in Bost. Liv. Age, liv. 158, 159.

"In most of Edgar Poe's tales there is either an extravagance, as though they had been written by a man on the verge of delirium tremens, or else a laboured monotony, as though his resources were beginning to run dry."—Lon. Athen., 1852, 1856, 260.

"The poems, with their strange, unwholesome vigour, (nightmare verses, if such things can be,) speak for themselves. Their writer, apart from his works, had best be forgotten."—Ibid., 1852, 1425.

"Poe stands as much alone among verse-writers as Salvator Rosa among painters."—Lon. Spectator.

"Edgar A. Poe, in his 'Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque,' evinces a genius in which a love of the marvellous and an intensity of conception are united with the wildest sympathies, as if the endowments of Mrs. Radcliffe and Coleridge were partially united in one mind."—H. T. Tuckerman: Sketch of Amer. Lit., 1852.

"There comes Poe with his raven, like Barnaby Rudge,
Three-fifths of him genius, and two-fifths sheer fudge.
* * * * * * * *
Who has written some things quite the best of their kind,
But the heart somehow seems all squeezed out by the mind."
Lowell's Fable for Critics, ed. 1856, '59.

We can now add: Contes inédits d'Edgar Poe, traduits de l'Anglais par William Hughes, Lon., 1862.

"Edgar Poe's stories seem all of them to have been written under the inspiration of gin-and-water; but they contrast with wonderful advantage with the cold, forced extravagances of the foregoing work."—Lon. Athen., 1862, ii. 734.

Pole, Pool, or Polus, Reynold, or Reginald, 1500–1558, equally illustrious from his birth, piety, and learning, was a younger son of Sir Richard Pole, K.G., by Margaret, daughter of George, Duke of Clarence, brother to King Edward IV., and cousin-german to Elizabeth, Queen of Henry VII. and mother of Henry VIII. He was born at Stoverton (or Stourton) Castle, Staffordshire; educated at the Carthusian monastery at Shene, and at Magdalene College, Oxford; made Preb. of Salisbury, 1517, and, before he was nineteen, received the deaneries of Wimbourne Minster and Essex; opposed the unrighteous divorce of Henry VIII., who stripped him of his preferments, and, had he not left England for Rome, would in all probability have sent him to the block with More and Fisher; created Cardinal-Deacon of S. Nereus and Achilleus, 1536; one of the three Papal Legates to the Council of Trent, 1545; narrowly escaped the popedom on the death of Paul III., 1549; resided at the Benedictine monastery at Maguzano, 1549–53; Papal Legate to reconcile England to Rome on the accession of Mary, 1554; ordained priest, succeeded Cranmer as Archbishop of Canterbury, and elected Chancellor of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, 1556; died Nov. 18, 1558, sixteen hours after the death of Queen Mary. See Life of Pole, by Abp. Beccatelli; in Italian, trans. by Duditus into Latin, Lon., 1690, 8vo, (see WHARTON, HENRY, No. 6,) and thence by Maucroix into French; from the Italian by Benj. VIII.: Cardinal Pole and the Anglican Ordinal. Cardinal Pole made some minor translations (printed and bound up with No. 4, infra) from St. Augustine, St. Chrysostom, St. Basil, St. Leo the Great, and St. Cyprian, and was the author of some Latin theological treatises, of which the following are the best-known: 1. Ad Henricum Octavum Britanniæ Regem pro Ecclesiasticæ Unitatis Defensione Libri Quatuor, folio, Romæ, apud Antonium Bladum, sine anno, sed circ. 1536? Very rare. Lord Guildford's copy was sold for £24. In the Bibliotheca Grenvilliana it is said that the book was suppressed: but it is more likely that it was never published: Pole promised not to publish it: see his letter to Henry, and also his letter to Edward VI., (Epistolæ, No. 1262.)

"Postea omnia quæ invenire potuit, exemplaria hujus libri (præterea quæ amicis tradiderat) collegit et flammit mandavit ipse Cardinalis."—BP. TANNER.

2. Liber de Concilio, Venet., 1562, 8vo; Dillingæ, 1562; Romæ, apud Paul. Manutium, 1562, 4to. The first book printed at Rome by Paul Manutius. Rare. 3. Reformatio Anglicæ ex Decretis ipsius Sedis Apostolicæ Legati, Anno MDLVI., Romæ, apud Paul. Manutium, 1562, 4to. Renourd gives a long extract from this volume, "à cause de sa grande rareté."

"A treatise which, for perspicuity, good sense, and solid reasoning, is equal to the importance of the occasion on which it was written, and shows at once the reach and ease of the author's genius, and goodness of his heart. The preface by Manutius [containing a masterly sketch of Pole's character] is long, and is one of the most elegant pieces of composition in the Latin language."—Phillips on Sacred Literature.

4. De Summo Pontifice Christi in Terris Vicario, et de ejus Officio et Potestate; in modum Dialogi conscriptus, cum privilegio, Lovanii, apud Joannem Foulerum, Anglum, MDLXIX.

"It was written by way of dialogue in the conclave of cardinals, when they were electing him pope. He also wrote five other books on the same subject, when he was out of the conclave."

5. A Treatise of Justification founde among the Writinges of Cardinal Pole, &c., Lovanii, 1569, 4to. See an account of this vol. in Athen. Oxon., Bliss's ed., i. 293. Wood's account of Pole is very full. He declares that his "piety, learning, and integrity of life did make him more illustrious than the splendour of his royal blood."

Such testimonies we delight to adduce; and that the biographer does not permit his zeal to outrun the record will be seen from the following contemporaneous evidence, quoted by Mr. Prescott, (supra:)

"Such a one as, for his wisdom, joined with learning, virtue, and godliness, all the world seeketh and adoreth."—Letter of Sir John Mason to the Queen, MS.

"Cardinal Pole," says the Venetian minister temp. Philip and Mary, "is a man of unblemished nobility, and so strict in his integrity that he grants nothing to the importunity of friends. He is so much beloved, both by prince and people, that he may well be styled the king, where all is done by his authority."—Relatione di Gio Micheli, MS.

"The benign character of this prelate, the modesty and humanity of his deportment, made him be universally beloved; insomuch that in a nation where the most furious persecution was carried on, and where the most violent religious factions prevailed, entire justice, even by most of the reformers, has been done to his merit."—HUME: Hist. of Eng., ch. xxxvii.

Pollok, Rev. R. Apocalyptic Regeneration: Lects. on the Book of Revelation, Lon., 1855–58, 2 vols. 12mo.

Pollok, Robert, 1799–1827, a native of Muirhouse, in the parish of Eaglesham, Renfrewshire, Scotland, was educated at the University of Glasgow; subsequently studied theology for five years under Dr. Dick, of Glasgow, and was licensed to preach by the United Associate Presbytery of Edinburgh in the spring of 1827. He never appeared in the pulpit but on one occasion: extremely debilitated by disease, he was persuaded to try the effects of the climate of Italy; but, whilst awaiting sufficient strength to allow of embarkation, he died near Southampton, September 15, 1827. In addition to the work by which he is best known,—The Course of Time,—he pub. whilst still a student, (anonymously:) 1. Helen of the Glen, last separate ed., Edin., 1867, 12mo; N. York, 18mo. 2. The three were pub. collectively in 1 vol., as Tales of the Covenanters, Edin., 1833, 18mo; last ed., 1867, 12mo; N. York, 18mo and 16mo. 4. The Course of Time was pub. by Blackwood, on the recommendation of Professor John Wilson, in 1827, 8vo. It was received with great favour both in Scotland and in the United States. The 78th 1000 was pub. in Edin., 1868, 18mo; an ed., illustrated by Birket Foster, S. Tenniel, and J. R. Clayton, sq. 8vo, 21s., appeared, London, 1857. In the United States more than twenty edits. have been pub.,—in N. York, Boston, and Philadelphia. Of the edits. pub. in N. York, to Appleton's there is appended an Analytical Index; Barnes's (School) ed. is illustrated by Notes by Prof. Boyd; and to Carters' is prefixed a Dissertation on the Genius of Robert Pollok, by Rev. James Scott, the editor of the Life, Letters, and Literary Remains of Robert Pollok, N. York, 12mo. The Life of Pollok, by his brother, was pub. at Edinburgh in 1843, p. 8vo; and to this work, and the authorities annexed, we refer the reader for fuller notices of Pollok and his principal production,—a poem the neglect of which by English critics is as observable as its popularity with Scotch and American readers. For his portion of this neglect Jeffrey was censured by Christopher North in Noctes Ambros., Dec. 1828, and Aug. 1834,—Blackw. Mag., xxiv. 695, xxxvi. 268; which, with vols. xxi. 844, xxvii. 677, and xxxi. 984, consult for critical notices of the Course of Time. Refer also to Chambers and Thomson's Dict. of Em. "The Course of Time, for so young a man, was a vast achievement. . . . He had much to learn in composition; and, had he lived, he would have looked almost with humiliation on much that is at present eulogized by his devoted admirers. But the soul of poetry is there, though often dimly enveloped, and many passages there are, and long ones too, that heave and hurry and glow along in a divine enthusiasm."—John Wilson: Blackw. Mag., xxxi. 984.

"The 'Course of Time' is a very extraordinary poem: vast in its conception—vast in its plan—vast in its materials—and vast, if very far from perfect, in its achievement. The wonderful thing is, indeed, that it is such as we find it, and not that its imperfections are numerous. It has nothing at all savouring of the little or conventional in it; for he passed at once from the merely elegant and graceful."—D. M. Moir: Sketches of Poet. Lit.

"Pollok's 'Course of Time,' much overlauded on its appearance, is the immature work of a man of genius who possessed very imperfect cultivation. It is clumsy in plan, tediously dissertative, and tastelessly magniloquent; but it has passages of good and genuine poetry."—Prof. Spalding, Univ. of Saint Andrew's: Hist. of Eng. Lit., chap. xiv.

Pomfret, Henrietta Louisa Fermor, Countess of. Her Correspondence, &c.: edited by Louisa Fermor,(?) Countess of Pomfret. See HARTFORD, FRANCES, COUNTESS OF.

Pomfret, John, 1667–1703, a native of Luton, Bedfordshire; educated at Queen's College, Cambridge; became Vicar of Malden, and was presented to a living of greater value, institution into which was at first refused by Bishop Compton, in consequence of a misconstruction of a passage in the parson's poem of The Choice. Pomfret made a satisfactory vindication; but whilst he lingered in London, engaged in this business, he caught the smallpox, the fatal termination of which abruptly ended alike his anxieties and his hopes. A volume of his Poems—The Choice, and others—was pub. in 1699; and in 1724 appeared his Remains: a vol. containing two poetical pieces,—Reason, and Dies Novissima, or The Last Epiphany; a Pindaric Ode. This vol. was pub. by a friend, under the name of Philalethes. The 4th ed. of The Choice was pub. 1701, fol.; the Tenth Edition of his Poems on Several Occasions, with an Account of his Life and Writings, to which are added his Remains, was issued in 1740, 8vo. Many eds. of his Poems have since appeared; and they are repub. in Johnson's and Chalmers's collections.

"His 'Choice' exhibits a system of life adapted to common notions and equal to common expectations; such a state as affords plenty and tranquillity, without exclusion of intellectual pleasures. Perhaps no composition in our language has been oftener perused than Pomfret's 'Choice.' In his other poems there is an easy volubility; the pleasure of smooth metre is afforded to the ear, and the mind is not oppressed with ponderous or entangled with intricate sentiment. He pleases many; and he who pleases many must have some species of merit."—DR. JOHNSON: Lives of the Poets.

The vol. containing Pomfret's Poems, Southey tells us, (Life and Corresp., chap. i.,) was one of the companions of his early days, and (for who does not remember with a melancholy pleasure his "first books"?) he seems to have contracted a lasting admiration for the bard. At least this is a fair inference from his query,

"Why is Pomfret the most popular of the English Poets? the fact is certain, and the solution would be useful."—Specimens of the Later English Poets, 1807, i. 91.

To this Mr. Campbell responds,—but his quotation is not accurate,—

"It is asked, in Mr. Southey's 'Specimens of English Poetry,' why Pomfret's 'Choice' is the most popular poem in the English language: it might have been demanded, with equal propriety, why London Bridge is built of Parian marble."—Campbell's Specimens.

The best proof of Pomfret's loss of popularity is the fact that in a day distinguished for the republication of the earlier poets, Pomfret is neglected. Mr. Hallam is no exception to this distaste:

"Then came Blackmore, with his epic poems of Prince Arthur and King Arthur, and Pomfret, with his Choice, both popular in their own age, and both intolerable, by their frigid and tame monotony, in the next."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 489.

Pond, Gideon H. See Riggs, Rev. Stephen, No. 1.

Pond, John, 1767?–1836, after finishing his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, travelled for some years on the Continent; subsequently resided at Westbury, near Bristol, until his marriage, in 1807, when he removed to London; succeeded Dr. Maskelyne as Astronomer-Royal in 1811, and retired from this office upon a pension in the autumn of 1835. He finished his Catalogue of 1113 stars (the largest of those which were considered trustworthy) in 1833. In his controversy with Brinkley on the parallax of the fixed stars, he is now generally thought to have been correct in his assertion that the latter "did not prove the existence of a sensible amount of parallax." 1. Mr. Pond's early zeal and success in his astronomical pursuits have been gracefully commemorated by Sir Humphry Davy; the merit and originality of his method of observation elicited the eulogies of Arago, Biot, Delambre, Bessel, and Schumacher; and the Astronomical Society has recorded on its archives that "It is not too much to say that the meridian sidereal observation (which excludes the Herschelian branch of astronomy) owes more to him than to all his countrymen put together since the time of Bradley."

The next work of Mr. Poole's must be prefaced by a brief explanation. In 1660, Cornelius Bee, an enterprising publisher of London, printed in that city a most valuable collection, in Latin, of the critical annotations on the Old and New Testaments of ninety of the most learned men in Europe, entitled Critici Sacri, 9 vols. fol. It was designed to be a companion to Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta, Lon., 1657, 6 vols. fol. The editors of the Critici Sacri were Bp. Pearson, John Pearson, Anthony Scattergood, and Francis Gouldman. A 10th vol., fol., entitled Commentaria et Disputatione in Epistoliam Pauli ad Hebræos, &c., sometimes accompanies the 9 vols. of the Critici Sacri. This great work was reprinted at Frankfort, cura Gurtler, in 1695, 7 vols. fol., also in 7 vols. 4to. This ed. is badly printed. In 1698 an excellent ed. was printed at Amsterdam, 8 vols. in 9 vols. fol. This is the edition which the librarian or the student must procure; and he must add to it the admirable Supplements, viz.: Thesaurus Theologico-Philologicus, Amst., 1701, 2 vols. fol.; Thesaurus Novus-Philologicus, 1732, 2 vols. fol.: in all, Amst., 13 vols. fol. A Table of the contents of the whole 13 vols. will be found in Darling's Cyc. Bibliog., vol. i., Authors, 815–826.

Mr. Poole, conceiving that an abridgment of the Critici Sacri, with additions in some parts, all methodically arranged throughout, would prove useful, prepared with great labour his (8) Synopsis Criticorum aliorumque Sacræ Scripturæ Interpretum, also in Latin, 4 vols. in 5, fol., pub. as follows: I. Gen.–Esth., 1669; II. Job–Cantic., 1671; III. Esaia.–Malach., 1673; IV. Pars 1, Matthæus–Acta Apost., 1674; IV. Pars 2, Rom.–Apoc.; Index Vocum Hebraicarum, Index Vocum Græcarum, Index Rerum, 1676. Some copies on thick paper, and some on large paper. When the first vol. was ready for the press, Mr. Bee, the proprietor of the Critici Sacri, accused Poole of invading his rights, which were secured by patent; but the controversy was decided in Poole's favour, and apparently to Bee's satisfaction, as his name appears as a vendor in the title-page of vol. i. See The Case between Mr. Pool and Mr. Cornelius Bee Considered and Decided, s. a., 4to. Cornelius Bee is the "industrious stationer" celebrated by Fuller (Worthies, ed. 1843, ii. 237) as "foster-father to many worthy books, to the great profit of posterity." The Synopsis was repub. as follows: I. Frankfort, 1678, 5 vols. fol. II. Utrecht, cura Joh. Leusden, 1684, 5 vols. fol. The best ed. III. Frankfort, with Pref. by Maius, 1694, 5 vols. large 4to. In small and bad print, and very incorrect. IV. Frankfort, 1709, 5 vols. fol. V. Frankfort, with Pref. by Pritius, 1712, 5 vols. fol. Worse than No. III. To Leusden's ed. of this work the student should add J. C. Wolf's Curæ Philologicæ et Criticæ in Novum Testamentum, etc.; Hamburg, 1732–35, 5 vols. 4to, or Basil, 1741, 5 vols. 4to, (best ed.;) and the continuation by J. C. Koecher, entitled Analecta Philologica et Exegetica in Quatuor Evangelia, Altenburgi, 1766, 4to. Of Wolf's Curæ Philologicæ an eminent critic remarks,

"This work has some resemblance, in the manner of its composition, to Poole's Synopsis, but is written with more judgment, and contains the opinions of many expositors who have lived since the publication of Poole's work."—Bishop Watson.

When he places these twenty-four volumes (including the Critici Sacri) on his shelf beside his Ximenes' and Walton's Polyglots, Castell's Lexicon, and Grinfield's Novum Testamentum Græcum, Editio Hellenistica, he may reckon himself prepared for any polemical emergency. Poole laboured at his Synopsis for about ten years, rising about three or four o'clock in the morning and working without intermission—save to swallow a raw egg about eight o'clock and another at twelve o'clock—until late in the afternoon,—when he unbent his mind in friendly visits and cheerful conversation: an excellent custom. As the price of the Critici Sacri (then, 1660, 9 vols. fol.) was £13 10*s.*, and of the Synopsis £5 10*s.*, we need not be surprised at the fact that 3800 sets of vols. i.–iv. (as bound, but really vols. i.–iii. and Part 1 of vol. iv.) were sold before vol. v. (really Part 2 of vol. iv.) had made its appearance. But how was the work performed?

"The object of the Synopsis is to condense, combine, and exhibit at one view the interpretations of Scripture dispersed through the Critici Sacri, previously published by Bee. The author has done this very successfully. He has omitted much that is useless in that work, abridged many prolix discussions, and added many other writers to those contained in the Sacred Critics. . . . It is much more convenient than the Critici Sacri, and contains, in a most accessible form, the views of not less than one hundred and fifty writers on the Scriptures. It consequently serves instead of many books now difficult to be obtained. . . . I can also say, from a long acquaintance with it, that a vast deal of what is important in the works of modern critics will be found in the learned volumes of the Synopsis. In his prefaces the author gives an account of the several writers whose works he introduces, with characters of them which deserve to be consulted with attention."—Orme's Bibl. Bib., 359.

"For when the excellent Mr. Pool had finished his laborious and immortal task, it was noted by some considerable persons, 'That, wanting assistance to collect for him many miscellaneous criticisms, occasionally scattered in other authors, he left many better things behind him than he found.'"—Cotton Mather: Magnalia, Gen. Introd., ed. 1852, 33.

"Matthew Pool, who, in his Synopsis Criticorum, vindicated the claims of the rejected ministers to profound Biblical learning."—Sir James Stephen: Edin. Rev., April, 1840, 221.

"I beseech the theological collector not to let a fine copy of good old Matthew Poole's 'Synopsis Criticorum' . . . slip through his fingers without becoming master of it."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 52.

"The plan of it was judicious, and the execution more free from errors than seems consistent with so great a work, finished in so short a time, by one man."—Granger's Biog. Hist. of Eng., 5th ed., 1824, v. 65.

"The work of Pool was evidently a more original labour than the former, [Critici Sacri.]"—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 298.

"Besides the great advantage of digesting the Critici Sacri into one view, it contains later editions, and the unevangelical criticisms of his originals are noticed and refuted by sound and evangelical criticism. The Critici Sacri is a mixture without discrimination."—Bickersteth's C. S., 4th ed., 1844, 392.

"It has many advantages over the Critici Sacri, not only in point of size, but in its admirable arrangement and concentration of evidence, and in the author's remarks; and it furnishes a most complete material index to the Critici Sacri. So that, upon the whole, the Synopsis will be preferred to the original by many besides the author of this note."—Hale's Chronology, ii., Pref. xviii.

But not by all:

"The Critici Sacri is the most important collection of Biblical Critics ever made. In point of size the work of Poole has advantages; but no man who is acquainted with both works will ever prefer the Synopsis to the original."—Dr. Adam Clarke.

He lived to carry the work down to the end of the 58th Chapter of Isaiah, only. The authors of the remainder of vol. i. and of vol. ii. were as follows: Isaiah lix., lx., Mr. Jackson; the remaining chapters of Isaiah, and Jeremiah and Lamentations, Dr. Collinges; Ezekiel, Mr. Hurst; Daniel, Mr. Cooper; Minor Prophets, Mr. Hurst; the Evangelists, Dr. Collinges; Acts, Mr. Vinke; Romans, Mr. Mayo; Corinthians and Galatians, Dr. Collinges, Ephesians, Mr. Veale; Philippians and Colossians, Mr. Adams; Timothy, Titus, Philemon, Dr. Collinges; Hebrews, Mr. O. Hughes; James, Peter, Jude, Mr. Veale; St. John's Epistles, Mr. Howe; Revelation, Dr. Collinges.

A German translation of the work was undertaken by Augustus Titellius, and a first part of it published; but it was never completed. We have no difficulty in adducing testimonies to the value of the Annotations.

"The Notes are short, but abound with good sense and sound judgment."—Dr. Adam Clarke.

"In critical points accurate, on historical subjects perspicuous."—Hervey.

"Of admirable use."—Matthew Henry.

It will be remembered that Philip Henry bequeathed a copy of the Annotations to each of his four daughters.

"I have added very largely from Mr. Poole, in order to the understanding those words Mr. Henry does not explain."—JOHN WESLEY.

"If we must have commentators, as we certainly must, Poole is incomparable, and, I had almost said, abundant of himself."—RICHARD CECIL.

"What is done by Poole is highly valuable, and is of use not only for occasional inspection, but also for diurnal meditation."—COTTON MATHER.

"The Annotations are mingled with the text, and are allowed to be very judicious."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 254.

"A very judicious work."—Williams's C. P., 284.

"Judicious and full."—Bickersteth's C. S., 394.

To these favourable opinions can be added those of Bishop Tomline, (who includes the Annotations in his list of works recommended to clergymen,) Doddridge, and Gilpin. Orme says that the notes of all the commentators "are of a useful and practical nature. Poole's own part is scarcely equal to what might have been expected from the author of the Synopsis. There is not much criticism in it, which perhaps he thought sufficiently supplied in the Latin work."—Bibl. Bib., 360.

Poole was also the author of a poem and two epitaphs upon Jeremy Whitaker, two epitaphs on Richard Vines, and another on Jacob Stock, a preface to Nolton's Serms., (see NOLTON, JAMES,) and some of the sermons in the Morning Exercises at Cripplegate, (see MATHER, COTTON, D.D., No. 11.)

It is no slight evidence of the excellence of Poole's character and the solidity of his learning, that, although a Dissenter, he enjoyed the friendship and esteem of such men as Bishops Lloyd, Tillotson, Reynolds, and many other prelates of his time, (who zealously promoted the preparation of his great work;) and even from the gruff old Churchman Anthony Wood is extorted the confession that the volumes of the Synopsis are "very admirable and useful books, for which we are bound to give him thanks," and he testifies that he left behind him "the character of a very celebrated critic and casuist." Pope. Poems and Pictures: a Collection of Ballads, Songs, and other Poems, by Eminent Authors, with 100 Engravings, Lon., 1846, 4to.

Pope, Alexander, May 21, 1688–May 30, 1744, was a native of London, the son of a "merchant who dealt in Hollands" (linens) of Broad Street, and subsequently of Lombard Street, who about the time of the Revolution retired to Binfield, Windsor Forest, with a fortune of ten to twenty thousand pounds. The smaller sum is stated on the authority of Martha Blount. He enjoyed his retirement for twenty-nine years, dying, October, 1717, in his 75th year, at Chiswick, where he was buried. His widow removed with the poet to Twickenham in December, 1717, or January, 1718; and she was the object of his warm affection and reverential care until her death, which occurred, at the great age of ninety, in June, 1733. Lord Hervey expressed his contempt for the imitator of Horace in the well-known line,

"Hard as thy heart, and as thy birth obscure;"

but Pope asserts that "Of gentle blood (part shed in honour's cause, While yet in Britain honour had applause)

Each parent sprung;"

(Epistle to Arbuthnot;)

but, had this been undisputed, the loftiest lineage would have redounded less to his honour than the fact that one of the most beautiful descriptions of filial piety which the language affords was drawn from his own daily experience:

"Me let the tender office long engage,
To rock the cradle of reposing age;
With lenient arts extend a mother's breath,
Make languor smile, and smooth the bed of death;
Explore the thought, explain the asking eye,
And keep awhile our parent from the sky."

Prologue to the Satires.

"The filial piety of Pope," says Dr. Johnson, "was in the highest degree amiable and exemplary; his parents had the happiness of living till he was at the summit of poetical reputation, till he was at ease in his fortune and without a rival in his fame, and found no diminution of his respect or tenderness. Whatever was his pride, to them he was obedient; and whatever was his irritability, to them he was gentle. Life has, among its soothing and quiet comforts, few things better to give than such a son."—Life of Pope.

No better testimony to Pope's character as a son can be demanded than the prominence of his mother's name in the letters of his most distinguished correspondents:

"It is affecting to note, through Pope's correspondence, the marked way in which his friends, the greatest, the most famous and wittiest men of the time—generals and statesmen, philosophers and divines—all have a kind word and a kind thought for the good, simple old mother whom Pope tended so affectionately. Those men would have scarcely valued her but that they knew how much he loved her and that they pleased him by thinking of her. If his early letters to women are affected and insincere, whenever he speaks about this one it is with a childish tenderness and an almost sacred simplicity."—Thackeray's English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century: Prior, Gay, and Pope.

Such was the tribute of friends; but one of the son's bitterest enemies—and not without reason an enemy—seems pleased to render an act of justice—indeed, more than justice—on this behalf:

"As to Pope's being born of honest parents, I verily believe it; and will add one praise to his mother's character, that (though I only knew her very old) she always appeared to me to have much better sense than himself."—Lady M. W. Montagu to Dr. Arbuthnot, Jan. 3, 1734–5.

After hearing her testimony, we have no occasion to marvel that her ladyship was a willing witness.

"Tell me, if virtue made the son expire,
Why, full of days and honour, lives the sire?
Why drew Marseilles' good bishop purer breath
When nature sicken'd and each gale was death?
Or why so long (in life if long can be)
Lent Heaven a parent to the poor and me?"

Essay on Man: Epistle IV.

Both of Pope's parents were Roman Catholics; and in the same faith he lived and died. Some will have it that he believed Protestantism, with Warburton; and others, that he disbelieved Christianity, with Bolingbroke; but the truth is that, although influenced by both, he was persuaded by neither.

He tells us that he "lisped in numbers;" and certainly one of the first uses to which he devoted his early knowledge of Greek and Latin—acquired under priestly tuition and at private schools—was the translation of the Metamorphoses of Ovid. His schoolmaster at Marylebone, and subsequently Hyde Park Corner, was Thomas Deane, "a creature and convert" (so Wood calls him) of Obadiah Walker, and one of the Fellows of University College who was declared non-socius after the Revolution. (See Wood's Athen. Oxon., Bliss's ed., iv. 451.) Delighted with the exquisite versification of Dryden, he was never satisfied until some friends, pleased with his zeal or annoyed by his importunity, took him to the Coffee-house where the author of The Hind and Panther reigned supreme. Had Dryden lived,—he died some days before Pope was twelve years of age,—he would doubtless have taken a lively interest in watching the development of the poetical genius of his youthful admirer. In this supposition we do not speak at random:

"I was informed by an intimate friend of Pope [Walter Harte] that when he was yet a mere boy Dryden gave him a shilling, by way of encouragement, for a translation he had made of the story of 'Pyramus and Thisbe,' from Ovid."—WARTON: Essay on Pope, i. 82, ed. 1782, and Warton's Life of Pope, p. xiii.

This we find quoted in Mr. Peter Cunningham's excellent ed. (1854, 3 vols. 8vo) of Johnson's Lives of the Most Eminent Poets, from the "corrective and explanatory notes" of which we shall have frequent occasion to borrow in our sketch of the life and works of Pope. In 1704 he attracted the attention of the wits—especially of the disreputable Wycherley—by his Pastorals, which, after being handed about in MS. for five years, were pub. in Tonson's Sixth Miscellany (the vol. commences with the Pastorals of Ambrose Philips) in 1709.

"As they well deserved, they were read with admiration, and many praises were bestowed upon them and upon the Preface, which is both elegant and learned [but principally borrowed from Rapin and others] in a high degree. . . .

"To charge these Pastorals with want of invention, is to require what was never intended. The imitations are so ambitiously frequent, that the writer evidently means rather to show his literature than his wit. It is surely sufficient for an author of sixteen not only to be able to copy the poems of antiquity with judicious selection, but to have obtained sufficient power of language and skill in metre to exhibit a series of versification which had in English poetry no precedent, nor has since had an imitation."—JOHNSON: Life of Pope.

"He [Warton] necessarily begins with the Pastorals, which, considered as representations of any kind of life, he very justly censures; for there is in them a mixture of Grecian and English, of ancient and modern, images. Windsor is coupled with Hyhla, and Thames with Pactolus. He remarks, I am afraid with too much justice, that there is not a single new thought in the Pastorals; and with equal reason declares that their chief beauty consists in their correct and musical versification, which has so influenced the English ear as to render every moderate writer harmonious."—JOHNSON: Review of Joseph Warton's Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope.

See, also, STERNHOLD, THOMAS, No. 1, (quotation from Sir J. Mackintosh.)

Between 1706 and 1709 (see London Athen., 1857, 1233) he wrote the Essay on Criticism, which was given to the world in 1711, 4to, commended by Addison in The Spectator, and attacked by Dennis (who was enraged by Pope's strictures) in a pamphlet more remarkable for vigour of style than amiability of spirit. The Essay on Criticism, together with other of the principal productions of its author, we shall notice more at length on a later page of this summary. To the Essay on Criticism succeeded the Messiah, first published in The Spectator, after receiving the revisions of Steele; the Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady; The Rape of the Lock, first pub. in Lintot's Miscellany, 1712, 8vo, (Pope's Miscellany, 2 vols. 12mo,) and issued in a much enlarged and improved shape, by Lintot, in 1714, 8vo. In the Guardian for 27th April, 1713, (No. 40,) appeared Pope's ironical comparison between his own Pastorals and those of Philips, (see PHILIPS, AMBROSE,) and in the same year he pub. his Ode on St. Cecilia's Birth-Day, folio, and also, in a folio volume, his poem on Windsor Forest, of which part was written at sixteen, about the same time as his Pastorals, and a part refers to the Peace, the then prevailing topic in all circles of society.

"The design of 'Windsor Forest' is evidently derived from 'Cooper's Hill,' with some attention to Waller's poem on 'The Park;' but Pope cannot be denied to excel his masters in variety and elegance, and the art of interchanging description, narrative, and morality."—JOHNSON: Life of Pope.

"On 'Windsor Forest' he [Warton] declares, I think without proof, that descriptive poetry was by no means the excellence of Pope. He draws this inference from the few images introduced into this poem which would not equally belong to any other place. He must inquire whether 'Windsor Forest' has in reality anything peculiar. The stag-chase is not, he says, so full, so animated, and so circumstantial as Somerville's. Barely to say that one performance is not so good as another is to criticise with little exactness. Yet Pope has directed that we should in every work regard the author's end. The stag-chase is the main subject of Somerville, and might therefore be properly dilated into all its circumstances, in Pope it was only incidental, and was to be despatched in a few lines."—JOHNSON: Review of Warton's Essay.

In October, 1713, he issued proposals for a translation of Homer's Iliad, which was completed in 1719 and pub. in 6 vols. 4to and folio, one guinea per volume, 1715–20. In the Notes he seems to have had the assistance of Broome, Jortin, and another scholar, whose name has not transpired. The Life of Homer which prefaces the work has been noticed in our life of Thomas Parnell, D.D., (supra.) In our sketch of Addison we have referred to the ill feeling between Pope and the former, produced by the simultaneous appearance of Pope and Tickell's(?) Version of the Iliad. Of Tickell's version it will be remembered that one book only appeared. Encouraged by the great success of this enterprise, and stimulated by losses in the "South Sea bubble," in 1722 Pope sought subscriptions for a translation of the Odyssey, in 5 vols. 4to and folio, at one guinea per volume. The work appeared, —it is asserted that the translation was not commenced until 1723,—according to these conditions, in 1725. Of this version Pope has the credit, generally, of twelve Books; the other twelve were translated by William Broome and Elijah Fenton,—as already noticed on pp. 253 and 586 of this Dictionary.

To return to our chronological series: in 1715 Pope pub., in an octavo volume, his poem of The Temple of Fame, which was attacked by Dennis in a hydra-headed pamphlet entitled Remarks upon Mr. Pope's Translation of Homer; with two Letters concerning Windsor Forest and the Temple of Fame, 1717, 8vo, pp. 92.

"The 'Temple of Fame,' he tells Steele in their correspondence, he had written two years before; that is, when he was only twenty-two years old, an early time of life for so much learning and so much observation as that work exhibits. . . . It has, as Steele warmly declared, 'a thousand beauties.' Every part is splendid; there is great luxuriance of ornaments; the original vision of Chaucer was never denied to be much improved; the allegory is very skilfully continued; the imagery is properly selected and learnedly displayed."—Johnson's Life of Pope.

It was in this year that he is supposed to have written his Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady, concerning the personality of whom there have been many conjectures. (See Athen., 1854, 876–879; Carruthers's Life of Pope, 2d ed., 1857.)

In 1717 he pub. a collection of his poems in a quarto volume, (also in folio,) and included therein one of his most famous productions,—the Epistle of Eloisa to Abelard. In 1722 he edited, with a Dedication to the Earl of Oxford, Poems on Several Occasions, by Thomas Parnell, D.D., 8vo; and in 1725 he gratified a lively curiosity, which was soon succeeded by a contemptuous indifference, by the publication, in six quarto volumes, of his long-expected edition of the Plays of Shakspeare. In 1727–28, 3 vols. 8vo, (a 4th vol., called The Third Volume, was added in 1732,) appeared Miscellaneous Pieces by Arbuthnot, Swift, Pope, and Gay; and in this collection the friends of the late Bishop Burnet were avowedly shocked—and perhaps secretly amused—by Memoirs of a Parish Priest, supposed to be intended to ridicule what was considered the good prelate's ostentatious display of his importance in his History of his Own Times, the first volume of which was published in 1724.

"This seemeth also most untrue, it being known to divers that these memoirs were written at the seat of the Lord Harcourt, in Oxfordshire, before that excellent person's (Bishop Burnet) death, and many years before the appearance of that history of which they are intended to be an abuse."—MARTINUS SCRIBLERUS: Proleg., &c. to the Dunciad.

In this collection also appeared Pope's treatise on Bathos, or Art of Sinking, which was the germ of the Dunciad. In 1728 The Dunciad was pub. at Dublin, and in the same year republished in that city once, and in London no less than five times. The number of editions we give on the authority of Pope himself, although he anticipates the date of publication by a year. See Cunningham's ed. of Johnson's Poets, 1854, iii., 52–53, 55–58; Notes and Queries, 1st Ser., vol. x., 1854, 477, 497, 517.

The Dunciad was published anonymously, but there was no mistaking the hand of the limner; and in two days we are assured that the whole town gave it to Pope. In 1741 a fourth book was added; and the whole was pub. under the title of The New Dunciad, as it was found in the year 1741, with the Illustrations of Scriblerus and Notes Variorum, 1742, 4to. Among the assailants of this unsparing satire was Dennis, who, having pub. Remarks on the Rape of the Lock, in 1728, 8vo, followed in the next year with Remarks on the Dunciad, 8vo. In 1732 Pope gave to the world his Epistle to Lord Bathurst, and the poem On the Use of Riches, and also published, anonymously, the First Epistle of the four which compose the Essay on Man; the Second and the Third Epistles, also without his name, followed in the next year, and the Four Epistles were pub. collectively, with his name, in 1734, 4to. The rest of his publications, all of a minor character, with the exception of one about to be noticed, will be registered in their order in the CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF POPE'S PUBLICATIONS which follows. In May, 1735, was pub., by Edmund Curll, the first of six volumes 8vo, and also in 12mo, 1735–39, (four were pub. 1735–36,) known in the book-market as Pope's Literary Correspondence; being a Collection of Letters which passed between him and several Eminent Persons. There were a number of issues of the different volumes of these letters, and the title-pages vary. (Pope's Literary Correspondence for Thirty Years, from 1704 to 1734, &c.) The first vol. of these Letters consists of epistles of Pope to Henry Cromwell, and were sold to Curll by an intimate acquaintance of the latter,—Mrs. Elizabeth Thomas. The volume sold well, and Curll was a keen bidder for papers which he could so readily convert into guineas. More letters were sent, and were published, but were denounced by Pope as clandestinely obtained and not correctly given. As Curll had promised the publication of letters of lords, which would have been a breach of privilege, he was summoned before the House of Lords for examination. He behaved courageously, (lavishing no flattery on Pope;) and, as no letters of the peers named, or of any other peers, were in the collection, he escaped without harm. We lack space for the details of the story; but it will be found in the lives of Pope by Roscoe, Johnson, and others, and has been succinctly related by Mr. Disraeli in his Narrative of the Extraordinary Transactions respecting the Publication of Pope's Letters. (Quarrels of Authors: Miscell. of Lit., ed. 1853, 186–189.)

"Dr. Johnson, although he appears not to have been aware of the subtle intricacy of this extraordinary plot, has justly drawn this inference: To make the copies public was the only purpose of Pope, ['may be reasonably supposed:' Johnson,] because the numbers offered for sale by the private messengers showed that hope of gain could not have been the motive of the impression. It seems that Pope, being desirous of printing his letters, and not knowing how to do, without imputation of vanity, what has in this country been done very rarely, contrived an appearance of compulsion; that when he could complain that his letters were surreptitiously published he might decently and defensively publish them himself."—DISRAELI: ubi supra.

Some new light on this subject will be found in London Athenæum, 1854, 835, and 1860, ii. 279, 316, 348. Certain it is that in 1737 Pope put forth a volume with the title, Works in Prose: containing Letters of A. Pope to Several of his Friends, &c., 4to, and also in folio. (For vol. ii., see CHRONOLOGICAL LIST, &c.) As may be readily imagined, Pope did not let his letters pass to the press without omissions, alterations, and additions to suit his own taste or what he supposed to be the taste of his prospective readers. (See Athen., 1854, 835, 875, 907; Cunningham's forthcoming edit. of Pope's Works.)

Pope had now for nearly forty years reigned supreme in the Republic of Letters,—his house at Twickenham the favourite resort of wits who sought amusement, and of nobles who coveted literary immortality by the conjunction of their names with that of the great master,—when that summons which fame cannot avert nor riches postpone disturbed his repose: he died, after receiving the last rites of his Church, on the 30th day of May, 1744. (See BOLINGBROKE, HENRY ST. JOHN, VISCOUNT, p. 215, ante.) With that fondness for the titled great which had distinguished him through life, he appointed Lord Bolingbroke his literary executor, the trust to be devolved on the Earl of Marchmont should the former not be living. To Warburton, who by his means had gained a wife and a mitre, he bequeathed the property of his works, which netted the polemical Churchman (as Johnson estimates) the handsome sum of four thousand pounds. There were also two female friends of the poet, of whom the reader may expect some account,—Teresa and Martha Blount, the first born in 1688, (died 1759,) and the last in 1690, (died 1763;) but they have little to do with the literary history of their famous associate, and to gratify other than literary curiosity we have neither space nor time. To assert that the character of these ladies—of Martha Blount especially—had never been impugned by commentators on Pope's domestic affairs would be going further than Mr. Bowles, and further than the truth. But we are glad to be able to record the verdict of Mr. Roscoe, which is fully endorsed by one of the most acute of the late inquirers into the biography of Pope, (see Athen., 1854, 909–910; also, 1856, 1398.)

"Roscoe well observes," remarks the critic just referred to, "that the intimacy which subsisted between Martha Blount and Pope 'was nothing more than a sincere and affectionate friendship, begun in early youth, and continuing with a mutual increase of esteem and attachment through life. . . . Even after the death of Pope she maintained an intercourse with persons of the highest character, rank, and fashion.'"—Athen., 1854, 909.

The intelligent commentator in the Athenæum illustrates the subject by an interesting letter, before unpublished, addressed by Pope to the god-father of the young ladies, dated 25 Dec., 1725. The critic appears to be as successful in the vindication of Teresa's character as in his championship of Martha against her libellers. He also defends Pope (Athen., 1854, 837–838) against the charges of love of great company and ostentatious parade of his wealth,—an accusation brought by Dr. Johnson in the lines which we are about to quote.

"The person of Pope," remarks Johnson, "is well known not to have been formed by the nicest model. He has, in his account of the 'Little Club,' compared himself to a spider, and by another is described as protuberant behind and before. He is said to have been beautiful in his infancy; but he was of a constitution originally feeble and weak; and, as bodies of a tender frame are easily distorted, his deformity was probably in part the effect of his application. His stature was so low that, to bring him to a level with common tables, it was necessary to raise his seat. But his face was not displeasing, and his eyes were animated and vivid. By natural deformity, or accidental distortion, his vital functions were so much disordered that his life was a 'long disease.' His most frequent assailant was the headache, which he used to relieve by inhaling the steam of coffee, which he very frequently required. Most of what can be told concerning his petty peculiarities was communicated by a female domestic of the Earl of Oxford, who knew him perhaps after the middle of life. He was then so weak as to stand in perpetual need of female attendance; extremely sensible of cold, so that he wore a kind of fur doublet under a shirt of very coarse warm linen with fine sleeves. When he rose, he was invested in a bodice made of stiff canvas, being scarce able to hold himself erect till they were laced, and he then put on a flannel waistcoat. One side was contracted. His legs were so slender that he enlarged their bulk with three pair of stockings, which were drawn on and off by the maid; for he was not able to dress or undress himself, and neither went to bed nor rose without help. . . . In all his intercourse with mankind he had great delight in artifice, and endeavoured to attain all his purposes by indirect and unsuspected methods. 'He hardly drank tea without a stratagem.'. . . . He practised his arts on such small occasions, that Lady Bolingbroke used to say, in a French phrase, that 'he played the politician about cabbages and turnips.' . . . In familiar or convivial conversation it does not appear that he excelled. . . . He sometimes condescended to be jocular with servants or inferiors; but by no merriment, either of others or his own, was he ever excited to laughter. . . . Of this fortune, which, as it arose from public approbation, was very honourably obtained, his imagination seems to have been too full: it would be hard to find a man so well entitled to notice by his wit that ever delighted so much in talking of his money. In his letters and in his poems, his garden and his grotto, his quincunx and his vines, or some hints of his opulence, are always to be found. The great topic of his ridicule is poverty; the crimes with which he reproaches his antagonists are their debts, their habitation in the Mint, and their want of a dinner. He seems to be of an opinion not very uncommon in the world, that to want money is to want every thing.

"Next to the pleasure of contemplating his possessions seems to be that of enumerating the men of high rank with whom he was acquainted, and whose notice he loudly proclaims not to have been obtained by any practice of meanness or servility,—a boast which was never denied to be true, and to which very few poets have ever aspired. Pope never set genius to sale; he never flattered those whom he did not love, or praised those whom he did not esteem."—JOHNSON: Life of Pope, Cunningham's ed., 95, 96, 99, 100, 101, 102.

"How foolish was it in Pope to give all his friendship to lords, who thought they honoured him by being with him, and to choose such lords as Burlington, Cobham, and Bolingbroke! . . . And then always saying, 'I do not value you for being a lord;' which was a sure proof that he did."—Boswell's Johnson, by Croker, ed. 1848, 604.

But hear something on the other side:

"Johnson . . . tells us that he talked too much 'of his money.' . . . Why, it were as reasonable to prefer a like charge against other men because in their letters they make mention of their wives and children. To Pope, whose whole life was but prolonged suffering, his garden, his grotto, his quincunx, and his vines, were wife and children,—every thing. . . . So far, indeed, was Pope from seeking lords for his acquaintance, that those he did know sought him, and those who sought him were amongst the most distinguished and intellectual men of his age. To Pope, more than to any other man, literature is indebted for its independent position: he found it servile and base, and he made it free."—Athen., 1854, 839.

Lady Montague, indeed, speaks very differently; but her ladyship was no friend to the poet:

"Pope courted with the utmost assiduity all the old men from whom he could hope a legacy,—the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Peterborough, Sir G. Kneller, Lord Bolingbroke, Mr. Wycherley, Mr. Congreve, Lord Harcourt, &c., and I do not doubt projected to sweep the Dean's [Swift's] whole inheritance if he could have persuaded him to throw up his deanery and come to die in his house; and his general preaching against money was meant to induce people to throw it away that he might pick it up."—Letter to the Countess of Bute, June 23, 1752.

But another lady, Pope's half-sister, declares, on the contrary,

"'Tis most certain that nobody ever loved money so little as my brother."—MRS. RACKETT: Spence, by Singer, ed. 1820, 267.

Again:

"He did not know anything of the value of money, and his greatest delight was in doing good offices for his friends."—MARTHA BLOUNT: Spence, by Singer.

Johnson does not fail to notice that

"He passed over peers and statesmen to inscribe his 'Iliad' to Congreve, with a magnanimity of which the praise had been complete, had his friend's virtue been equal to his wit," and adds:

"Why he was chosen for so great an honour it is not now possible to know. There is no trace in literary history of any particular intimacy between them. The name of Congreve appears in the letters among those of his other friends, but without any observable distinction or consequence."—Life of Pope, 102–103.

But Lord Macaulay (Essays, ed. 1854, iii. 51–52,) suggests a solution of this difficulty, which we imagine will be accepted as a satisfactory one.

Even in the greatest company he sometimes imitated the immortal bard whom he professed to render into English.

"When he wanted to sleep, he 'nodded in company,' and once slumbered at his own table while the Prince of Wales was talking of poetry."—JOHNSON: Life of Pope, 97.

"If I could receive letters from you and Mr. Pope as you had leisure, I would never come in town as long as I live. In that way of conversing I should have all the pleasure that I can possibly propose, without the disappointment when Mr. Pope falls asleep, nor the dread of your taking leave because you are weary."—Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, to Lord Marchmont, March 15, 1742.

"I am glad you sleep better. I sleep in company, and wake at night, which is vexatious."—Pope to Richardson, Nov. 21.

"I nod in company, I wake at night:
Fools rush into my head, and so I write."
Imitations of Horace, Book ii., Satire i.

It is recorded to his praise that

"The virtues which seem to have had most of his affection were liberality and fidelity of friendship, in which it does not appear that he was other than he describes himself. . . . In the duties of friendship he was zealous and constant; . . . it does not appear that he lost a single friend by coldness or injury those who loved him once continued their kindness."—JOHNSON, Life of Pope, 108.

We shall have occasion on a later page to refer to various sources for fuller information on the life and writings of Pope than our limits enable us to give; but it is proper at this stage of our sketch to notice the new discoveries elicited by the painstaking investigations of writers, who in the columns of Notes and Queries, (Popiana, &c., vol. x., &c.,) and of the Athenæum, (1854, 835, 875, 907, 942; 1856, 780, 839, 899, 1397; 1857, 693, 829, 911, 1206, 1232, 1451; 1858, Pt. 1, 585, 622, 654; 1860, ii. 151, 710,) have given the results of their studies to the public.

"It is no extravagant arithmetic," remarks Mr. Robert Carruthers, whose own intelligent labours in this field are hereafter to be noticed, "to say that more authentic information regarding the personal and literary history of Pope has transpired within the last three or four years than had accumulated during the previous century."—Athen., 1856, 839, 1397.

I. With Commentaries and Notes by Warburton, Lon., 1751, 9 vols. 8vo; 1752, 9 vols. 8vo; 1753, 9 vols. 8vo; 1754, 10 vols. sm. 8vo; 1757, 9 vols. 8vo; 1760, 9 vols. 8vo; 1764, 6 vols. 8vo; 1764, 12 vols. 12mo; 1766, 9 vols. 8vo; 1767, 6 vols. 12mo; 1770, 9 vols. 8vo; 1770, 6 vols. 12mo; 1777, 6 vols. sm. 8vo.

"The poet . . . consigned his immortal works to the mercy of a ridiculous commentary and a tasteless commentator, whose labours have cost so much pains to subsequent editors to remove."—Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors, in Miscell. of Lit., ed. 1853, 168. See, also, 175.

"His notes on Pope are conceited, futile, and frivolous."—Joseph Warton: Pope's Works, iii. 158.

"There is no reason to doubt that he executed it with fidelity."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxii. 273, q. v.

See, also, Verses occasioned by Mr. Warburton's Late Edition of Mr. Pope's Works, 1751; Jeffrey's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 881.

II. In French, Vienne, 1761, 7 vols. 8vo.

III. With a Commentary and Notes by Owen Ruffhead, Lon., 1769, 5 vols. 4to. Ruffhead's Life of Pope was pub. 1769, 8vo. The materials were supplied by Warburton, and he also corrected the proofs.

"Ruffhead, . . . a singularly wretched critic."—Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors, 179, n.

"He [Johnson] censured Ruffhead's Life of Pope, and said he knew nothing of Pope and nothing of poetry."—Boswell's Johnson, by Croker, 235.

IV. With Remarks and Illustrations by Gilbert Wakefield, Warring., vol. i., 1794, 8vo. Again, entitled Observations on Pope, Lon., 1796, 8vo, pp. 350. This vol.—all that was pub.—consists of notes, chiefly on the minor poems.

"It is to be regretted that he felt himself deterred from its completion by the promised edition of Joseph Warton; since, as far as it goes, Wakefield's volume is one of the most satisfactory performances of its kind."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 738.

"True, . . . if by 'its kind' is meant the great genus of Assery. The work is certainly below all contempt—ignorant, stupid, asinine, bestially dull, and degraded to the utmost possible pitch of any man's satisfaction."—Blackw. Mag., xvii. 76. See, also, lvii. 396, (by Prof. Wilson.)

V. With Notes and Illustrations by Joseph Warton, D.D., Lon., 1797, 9 vols. 8vo; Basil, 1803, 9 vols. 8vo; 1822, 9 vols. 8vo, £4 14s. 6d.

"The expectations of the learned world were, it must be admitted, generally disappointed."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 738.

"If Warburton wrote much to show his ingenuity, Warton has written a great deal to display his reading."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxii. 275, q. v.

"Dr. Warton contributed much valuable matter in anecdote and criticism, amidst much that was irrelevant, though curious, and which ought to be expunged. His Life of Pope is most negligently composed, and of little value except in the way of anecdote."—Lon. Gent. Mag., Oct. 1836, 339. See, also, Mathias's Pursuits of Lit., Dial. IV., Notes, 135–138.

Included in Warton's ed. will be found his Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope, vol. i., 1756, 8vo: anon.; 2d ed., 1762, 8vo; reviewed by Dr. Johnson in the Literary Magazine, vol. ii., 1762, 8vo; 4th ed. of both, 1782, 2 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1806, 2 vols. 8vo, l. p. r. 8vo. Of vol. ii. 200 pp. were printed twenty years before publication.

"Its object appeared to be to depreciate Pope in the opinion of posterity. . . . In its way, a master-piece of curious and elegant erudition."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 738.

"He [Johnson, in 1772] praised Dr. Joseph Warton's Essay on Pope; but said 'he supposed we should have no more of it, as the author had not been able to persuade the world to think of Pope as he did."—Boswell, by Croker, 235.

"A very pleasing book."—DR. JOHNSON: ubi supra, 153.

"A book which teaches how the brow of Criticism may be smoothed, and how she may be enabled, with all her severity, to attract and to delight."—DR. JOHNSON: Life of Pope, 127. See, also, Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., 1810, 4to, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 68.

The Essay is highly commended by Sir S. E. Brydges in his ed. of Phillips's Theat. Poet. Anglic., Pref., xxxix., xl.

VI. With some Original Letters, Additional Observations, and Memoirs of the Life of the Author, by the Rev. William Lisle Bowles, Lon., 1806, 10 vols. 8vo. Some copies l. p. Contains selections from the Notes of Warburton, Warton, Johnson, Wakefield, Chalmers, and others. The last vol. contains a General Index. We have already referred on a preceding page (see BOWLES, REV. WILLIAM LISLE) to the spirited controversy elicited by the publication of Bowles's edition of Pope's Works. A list of pamphlets and papers on the subject, by Bowles, Byron, and Octavius Gilchrist, will be found prefixed to an elaborate article on Pope's Works and Character, in the London Quarterly Review, xxxii. 271–311. Mr. Bowles's editorial spirit is not approved by the critic:

"Every part of his performance is pervaded by a spirit so decidedly hostile, that we know not how to account for its being felt towards a man who has been dead nearly a century, and towards a fame so resplendent that even the fondest aspirations of Mr. Bowles's youthful muse could never have hoped to eclipse it."

"To Mr. Bowles we are indebted for an improved edition, for some elegant and sound criticism, and some new facts."—Lon. Gent. Mag., Oct. 1836, 339.

Articles on the Bowles controversy will also be found in Blackw. Mag., v. 387; ix. 132, 227; x. 182; xi. 483; xii. 71; xvii. 376; xviii. 373, 374, 590; Lon. Gent. Mag., 1821, Pt. I, 291, 533; N. Amer. Rev., xiii. 450, (by Wm. H. Prescott, the historian.) See, also, Moore's Life of Byron, Hazlitt's Lects. on the English Poets, Appendix IV.; and consult review of Bowles's edition of Pope's Works, in Edin. Rev., ix. 399; Edin. Month. Rev., v. 616.

VIII. Works, Lon., 6 vols. 4to; £8 14*s.* (Cadell's ed.)

IX. Works, with Select Notes, Lon., 8 vols. 12mo. (Cadell's ed.)

X. With Notes and Illustrations by Himself and Others; to which are added a New Life of the Author, an Estimate of his Poetical Character and Writings, and Occasional Remarks, by William Roscoe, Lon., 1824, 10 vols. 8vo, £6; 2d ed., 1846, (some title-pages bear 1847, and some 1848,) 8 vols. 8vo, £4 4*s.* Arrangement: vol. i., Life of Pope, by Roscoe; ii., Early Poems; Translations and Imitations; Essay on Criticism; Rape of the Lock; iii., Miscellaneous Poems; The Dunciad; iv., Essay on Man; Moral Epistles; Satires; v., Satires; Fragments and Fugitive Pieces; Prose Writings; vi.–viii., Correspondence.

"He has without ceremony taken much of what is valuable in Mr. Bowles's book to add to the value of his own. His original criticism is not much, but is enlightened and liberal, and the candour with which that and the life are written is quite refreshing, after the blighting perversity of the preceding editors, whose misrepresentations and calumnies he has industriously examined and patiently refuted, with a lucid arrangement both of facts and arguments. Great industry, too, is exhibited in the superior arrangement of his materials, especially of the correspondence of Pope and his friends. He has given an index only to the volume containing the life. We much wish he had imitated Mr. Bowles in giving a general index, which is particularly convenient in so miscellaneous a collection as the works of Mr Pope."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxii. 277.

"Mr. Roscoe added but little in his Annotations; but his Life of Pope is written with care, the disputed points well considered, and it is well worthy of attention. But much is still wanted."—Lon. Gent. Mag., Oct. 1836, 339.

"As a whole, the edition before us is certainly the most agreeable of all that we possess. The fidelity of Mr. Roscoe to the interests of Pope's reputation contrasts pleasingly with the harshness at times of Bowles, and the reckless neutrality of Warton. . . . Mr. Roscoe's own notes are written with a peculiar good sense, temperance, and kind feeling."—DE QUINCEY: Essays on the Poets, &c., Bost., 1853, 199.

"Mr. Roscoe is the most careful of Pope's editors; but even he is often wrong."—DE QUINCEY: Life of Pope, in Encyc. Brit., reprinted in his Biographical Essays, Bost., 1851, 160.

Mr. De Quincey prefaces the last-quoted paragraph by the complaint,

"We must caution the readers of Pope against too much reliance upon the chronological accuracy of his editors. All are scandalously careless; and generally they are faithless. Many allusions are left unnoticed, which a very little research would have illustrated; many facts are omitted, even yet recoverable, which are essential to the just appreciation of Pope's satirical blows; and dates are constantly misstated." See No. 12, infra.

This onslaught will provoke a smile from those who have critically examined Mr. De Quincey's own biographical notices of Pope. For instance, he tells us that the "disgraceful imputation of Pope's causing his letters to be published, by Croker, is assuredly unfounded." (!)

XI. Works, with a Memoir of the Author, Notes, and Critical Notices on each Poem, by the Rev. George Croly, LL.D., Lon., 1835, 4 vols. 12mo. This edition was announced to be in six volumes.

"We cannot commend the new life of Pope, even as a compendium of facts collected from former works; for it omits some material circumstances."—Lon. Gent. Mag., Oct. 1836, 339.

We venture to announce in anticipation,—not for the first time, (see CROKER, RT. HON. JOHN WILSON, D.C.L.; CUNNINGHAM, PETER,)—

XII. The Works of Alexander Pope, containing nearly 150 Unpublished Letters; edited by the Rt. Hon. John Wilson Croker, assisted by Peter Cunningham, F.S.A., 6 vols. 8vo.

"This edition will be collated for the first time with all the editions which appeared in the Poet's lifetime, including those of Warburton, Warton, and Roscoe; and the allusions throughout will be explained with greater fulness and accuracy than has yet been attempted. The Letters will include Pope's hitherto unpublished Correspondence with Edward, Earl of Oxford, and with Broome, his assistant in the translation of the Odyssey; while the Life will contain many new facts of importance and correct many errors of previous biographers."—Advertisement by Mr. Murray.

This edition was announced by Mr. Murray in 1854, (see Athen., 1854, 835, 875, 905, 907, 942;) it was delayed by Mr. Croker's good fortune in obtaining, in 1855, Pope's MS. correspondence with Lord Bathurst, Dr. Arbuthnot, and David Mallett; and in May, 1859, Mr. Cunningham, upon whom, since the death of Mr. Croker, the whole of the editorial duties devolve, received a further illustration of the embarras de richesse by the acquisition of nearly 100 unpublished letters of Pope to Broome. These letters, which throw much light on the history of the translation of the Odyssey, were purchased by Mr. Murray at Simpson's sale (May, 1859) for 100 guineas. Mr. Murray, by purchase, a few weeks before Mr. Croker's death, had become the possessor of the valuable Pope MSS. of the latter. Such enterprise deserves all commendation. In October, 1858, a package of Pope's works, in his own MS.,—Essay on Man, Rape of the Lock, &c.,—long preserved by the care of the Richardsons, was brought to light. See Lon. Illust. News, Oct. 1858. The long-promised edition just referred to has not yet (August 27, 1866) appeared. The Rev. Whitwell Elwin, late editor of the Quarterly Review, (1853–60,) has succeeded Mr. Cunningham in the editorial chair. We are to have (when?) about 700 letters never before collected, and of these nearly 500 have not yet ever been in type, (1869.)

4. Essay on Criticism.

The Essay was neglected until Pope "packed up and directed twenty copies" to Lord Lansdowne, the Duke of Buckingham, and other "great men."

"One of these gentlemen himself [Pope] can tell you that his admirable 'Essay on Criticism' lay upon the bookseller's hands for some time."—Arbuthnot: Works, i. 110.

Warburton endeavours to give the appearance of a consistent scheme to the poem; but before Pope knew the divine (see Essay on Man, post) he always spoke of it as "an irregular collection of thoughts" thrown together as Horace's Art of Poetry was. (See Richardsoniana, 264.) Addison also (Spectator, 253) compares it in irregularity to Horace's Art of Poetry. Prefixed to the Dunciad will be found the opinions, favourable and unfavourable, of various critics on the Essay on Criticism and several other of the author's works. Among these cited opinions on the Essay on Criticism is that of John Dennis, who complains that "His precepts are false, or trivial, or both; his thoughts are crude and abortive, his expressions absurd, his numbers harsh and unmusical, his rhyme trivial and common; instead of majesty, we have something that is very mean; instead of gravity, something that is very boyish; and instead of perspicuity and lucid order, we have too often obscurity and confusion."—Reflections, Critical and Satirical, &c.

Addison is also quoted:

"The Essay on Criticism, which was published some months since, is a master-piece in its kind. . . . There are some of them [the observations] uncommon, but such as the reader must assent to, when he sees them explained with that ease and perspicuity in which they are delivered. As for those which are the most known and the most received, they are placed in so beautiful a light, and illustrated with such apt allusions, that they have in them all the graces of novelty, and make the reader, who was before acquainted with them, still more convinced of their truth and solidity."—The Spectator, No. 253, Dec. 20, 1711.

Lady Montagu found but few "uncommon observations;" but, apart from her bitter hostility, her dictum is of little weight when contrasted with Addison's:

"I admired Mr. Pope's 'Essay on Criticism' at first very much," she tells us, "because I had not then read any of the ancient critics, and did not know that it was all stolen."

We cite some opinions:

"For a person only twenty years old to have produced such an Essay, so replete with knowledge of life and manners, such accurate observations on men and books, such variety of literature, such strong good sense and refined taste and judgment, has been the subject of frequent and of just admiration."—Joseph Warton.

"A work which displays such extent of comprehension, such nicety of distinction, such acquaintance with mankind, and such knowledge both of ancient and modern learning, as are not often attained by the maturest age and longest experience. . . . One of his greatest, though of his earliest, works is the 'Essay on Criticism,' which, if he had written nothing else, would have placed him among the first critics and the first poets, as it exhibits every mode of excellence that can embellish or dignify didactic composition,—selection of matter, novelty of arrangement, justness of precept, splendour of illustration, and propriety of digression. I know not whether it be pleasing to consider that he produced this piece at twenty, and never afterwards excelled it: he that delights himself with observing that such powers may be soon attained, cannot but grieve to think that life was ever after at a stand. To mention the particular beauties of the Essay would be unprofitably tedious; but I cannot forbear to observe that the comparison of a student's progress in the sciences with the journey of a traveller in the Alps, is perhaps the best that English poetry can show."—Johnson: Life of Pope, xi. 120, 121.

Respecting this simile, see Lon. Gent. Mag., Jan. 1834, 9, (Diary of a Lover of Lit.)

"Some people have very unreasonably fancied it his best performance."—De Quincey: Life of Pope, in Encyc. Brit., 8th ed., xviii., 1859, 329.

"The quantity of thought and observation in this work, for so young a man as Pope was when he wrote it, is wonderful. . . . The conciseness and felicity of the expression are equally remarkable. . . . Nothing can be more original and happy than the general remarks and illustrations in the Essay: the critical rules laid down are too much those of a school, and of a confined one."—Hazlitt: Lects. on the Eng. Poets, Lect. IV.

"The praise that is uppermost in one's mind of the Essay on Criticism is its rectitude of legislation. Pope is an orthodox doctor—a champion of the good old cause. . . . It is of the right good English temper,—thoughtful and ardent, discreet and generous, firm with sensibility, bold and sedate, manly and polished. He establishes himself in well-chosen positions of natural strength, commanding the field; and he occupies them in the style of an experienced leader, with forces judiciously disposed, and showing a resolute front every way of defence and offence."—Prof. John Wilson: Blackw. Mag., lvii. 393.

See Cursory Remarks on some Passages in Pope's Essay on Criticism, in Lon. Gent. Mag., Oct. 1852, 338–347.

5. The Rape of the Lock.

Written at the instance of Mr. Caryl, with the object of healing a breach caused by "a frolic of gallantry, rather too familiar," in which Robert, seventh Lord Petre, cut off a lock of Arabella Fermor's hair. (See Johnson's Life of Pope, Cunningham's ed., 18, n.)

"On so slight a foundation has he raised the beautiful superstructure, like a fairy-palace in a desert."—Joseph Warton.

"The most airy, the most ingenious, and the most delightful of all his compositions. . . . The 'Rape of the Lock' stands forward, in the classes of literature, as the most exquisite example of ludicrous poetry. Berkeley congratulated him upon the display of powers more truly poetical than he had shown before: with elegance of description and justness of precepts, he had now exhibited boundless fertility of invention. He always considered the intermixture of the machinery with the action as his most successful exertion of poetical art. He indeed could never afterwards produce any thing of such unexampled excellence. Those performances which strike with wonder are combinations of skilful genius with happy casualty; and it is not likely that any felicity like the discovery of a new race of preternatural agents should happen twice to the same man. . . To the praises which have been accumulated on 'The Rape of the Lock' by readers of every class, from the critic to the waiting-maid, it is difficult to make any addition. Of that which is universally allowed to be the most attractive of all ludicrous compositions, let it rather now be inquired from what sources the power of pleasing is derived."—Johnson: Life of Pope, 18, 20, 124.

"This seems to be Mr. Pope's most finished production, and is, perhaps, the most perfect in our language. It exhibits stronger powers of imagination, more harmony of numbers, and a greater knowledge of the world, than any other of this poet's works; and it is probable, if our country were called upon to show a specimen of their genius to foreigners, this would be the work fixed upon."—Goldsmith: Works, by Cunningham, iii. 435.

"I hope it will not be thought an exaggerated panegyric to say that the Rape of the Lock is the best satire extant; that it contains the truest and liveliest picture of modern life; and that the subject is of a more elegant nature, as well as more artfully conducted, than that of any other heroi-comic poem. If some of the most candid of the French critics begin to acknowledge that they have produced nothing in point of sublimity and majesty equal to the Paradise Lost, we may also venture to affirm that in point of delicacy, elegance, and fine-turned raillery, on which they have so much valued themselves, they have produced nothing equal to the Rape of the Lock. . . . The description of the Toilet is judiciously given in such magnificent turns as dignify the offices performed in it. Belinda dressing is painted in as pompous a manner as Achilles arming. . . . The seeming importance given to every part of female dress, ['To change a flounce, or add a furbelow,' &c.,] each of which is committed to the care and protection of a different sylph, with all the solemnity of a general appointing the several posts in his army, renders this whole passage admirable, on account of its politeness, poignancy, and poetry. . . . Our poet still rises in the delicacy of his satire ['Whatever spirit, careless of his charge,' &c.] where he employs, with the utmost elegance, all the implements and furniture of the toilet as instruments of punishment to those spirits who shall be careless of their charge. . . . He took the idea of these invisible beings, so proper to be employed in a poem of this nature, from a little French book entitled 'Le Comte de Gabalis.'"—JOSEPH WARTON.

But—comments Johnson on this last remark—

"What is there but the names of his agents which Pope has not invented? Has he not assigned them characters and operations never heard of before? Has he not, at least, given them their first poetical existence? If this is not sufficient to denominate his work original, nothing original ever can be written."—Life of Pope, 124.

"It is the most exquisite specimen of filigree work ever invented. It is admirable in proportion as it is made of nothing. . . . It is made of gauze and silver spangles. The most glittering appearance is given to every thing,—to paste, pomatum, billets-doux and patches. Airs, languid airs, breathe around; the atmosphere is perfumed with affectation. A toilette is described with the solemnity of an altar raised to the goddess of Vanity, and the history of a silver bodkin is given with all the pomp of heraldry. No pains are spared, no profusion of ornament, no splendour of poetic diction, to set off the meanest things. The balance between the concealed irony and the assumed gravity is as nicely trimmed as the balance of power in Europe. The little is made great, and the great little. You hardly know whether to laugh or weep. It is the triumph of insignificance, the apotheosis of foppery and folly. It is the perfection of the mock-heroic!"—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Eng. Poets, Lect. IV.

"Its wit and humour are of the most delicate and highly-finished kind; its fictions sportive and elegant, and conceived with a propriety and force of imagination which astonish and fascinate every reader."—DR. DRAKE.

"His best poem, the Rape of the Lock."—LORD MACAULAY: Crit. and Hist. Essays, ed. 1854, iii. 419.

"There is no finer gem than this poem in all the lighter treasures of English fancy. Compared with any other mock-heroic in our language, it shines in pure supremacy for elegance, completeness, point, and playfulness. It is an epic poem in that delightful miniature which diverts us by its mimicry of greatness and yet astonishes by the beauty of its parts and the fairy brightness of its ornaments. In its kind it is matchless; but still it is but mock-heroic, and depends, in some measure, for effect, on a ludicrous reference in our own minds to the veritable heroics whose solemnity it so wittily affects."—LORD JEFFREY.

"The most exquisite monument of playful fancy that universal literature offers."—DE QUINCEY: Life of Pope, in Encyc. Brit.

"The Italians have no poetry of a mezzo carattere like our Rape of the Lock, where a fine atmosphere of irony pervades the piece and gives life to every character in it. . . . The importance which it gives to the elegant nothings of high life, its perpetual sparkling of wit, the fairy fretwork which constitutes its machinery, have made it superior, as a fine piece of irony, to either of its foreign rivals. A Frenchman would doubtless prefer the epic regularity, progressive action, and smooth, see-saw versification of the Lutrin, [of Boileau,] while an Italian would find sufficient in the grand heroic sentiment and the voluptuous portraiture with which Tassoni's unequal poem [Secchia Rapita, —Rape of the Bucket] is occasionally inlaid, to justify his preference of it. There is no accounting for national taste. La Harpe, the Aristarchus of French critics, censures the gossamer machinery of the 'Rape of the Lock' as the greatest defect of the poem: 'La Fable des Sylphes, que Pope a très-inutilement empruntée du Comte de Gabalis, pour en faire le merveilleux de son poëme, n'y produit rien d'agréable, rien d'intéressant!'"—WM. H. PRESCOTT: Miscellanies, ed. 1855, 473–4, 521.

See, also, Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, iii. 8, n.

"In my eyes, the 'Lutrin,' the 'Dispensary,' and the 'Rape of the Lock' are standards of grace and elegance, not to be paralleled by antiquity. . . . The 'Rape of the Lock,' besides the originality of great part of the invention, is a standard of graceful writing."—Horace Walpole to J. Pinkerton, June 26, 1785: Letters, ed. 1861, viii. 565, 566. See, also, (Elegy on an Unfortunate Lady,) 534.

6. ELOISA TO ABELARD.

"His first inclination to an attempt of that tender kind arose, as Mr. Savage told me, from his perusal of Prior's 'Nut-Brown Maid.' How much he has surpassed Prior's work it is not necessary to mention, when perhaps it may be said with justice that he has excelled every composition of the same kind. The mixture of religious hope and resignation gives an elevation and dignity to disappointed love which images merely natural cannot bestow. The gloom of a convent strikes the imagination with far greater force than the solitude of a grove. . . . One of the most happy productions of human wit. . . . The story, thus skilfully adopted, has been diligently improved. Pope has left nothing behind him which seems more the effect of studious perseverance and laborious revisal. Here is particularly observable the curiosa felicitas, a fruitful soil and careful cultivation. Here is no crudeness nor asperity of language. The sources from which sentiments which have so much vigour and efficacy have been drawn are shown to be the mystic writers by the learned author [Joseph Warton] of the Essay on the Life and Genius of Pope."—JOHNSON: Life of Pope, 21, 126.

"Mr. Pope's 'Eloisa to Abelard' is such a chef-d'œuvre that nothing of the kind can be relished after it. Yet it is not the story itself, nor the sympathy it excites in us, as Dr. Johnson would have us think, that constitutes the principal merit in that incomparable poem. It is the happy use he has made of the monastic gloom of the Paraclete, and of what I call Papistical machinery, which gives it its capital charm; so that I am almost inclined to wonder (if I could wonder at any of that writer's criticisms) that he did not take notice of this beauty, as his own superstitious turn certainly must have given him more than a sufficient relish for it."—MASON: Life of Whitehead, 1788, 8vo, 35.

What culpable carelessness! Johnson especially calls attention to the effect produced by the "monastic gloom:" his very words are (supra) "the gloom of a convent." Mason's reference to what he calls Johnson's "superstitious turn" is in very bad taste.

Prior, from whom Savage says Pope thus derived his hint, was one of the warmest eulogists of the poem:

> "O Abelard! ill-fated youth,
> Thy tale will justify this truth;
> But well I weet, thy cruel wrong
> Adorns a nobler poet's song:
> Dan Pope, for thy misfortune grieved,
> With kind concern and skill has weaved
> A silken web; and ne'er shall fade
> Its colours; gently has he laid
> The mantle o'er thy sad distress,
> And Venus shall the texture bless," &c.
> Alma, Canto II.

"The harmony of numbers in this poem is very fine. It is rather drawn out to too tedious a length, although the passions vary with great judgment. It may be considered as superior to any thing in the epistolary way; and the many translations which have been made of it into the modern languages are in some measure a proof of this."—GOLDSMITH: Works, by Cunningham, iii. 436.

"It is fine as a poem; it is finer as a piece of high-wrought eloquence. No woman could be supposed to write a better love-letter in verse. Besides the richness of the historical materials, the high gusto of the original sentiments which Pope had to work upon, there were perhaps circumstances in his own situation which made him enter into the subject with even more than a poet's feeling. The tears shed are drops gushing from the heart; the words are burning sighs breathed from the soul of love. Perhaps the poem to which it bears the greatest similarity in our language is Dryden's Tancred and Sigismunda, taken from Boccaccio. Pope's Eloisa will bear this comparison; and after such a test, with Boccaccio for the original author and Dryden for the translator, it need shrink from no other."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Eng. Poets, Lect. IV.

"The self-conflict—the flux and reflux of the poor agitated heart—the spectacle of Eloisa now bending penitentially before the shadowy austerities of a monastic future, now raving upon the remembrances of the guilty past—one moment reconciled by the very anguish of her soul to the grandeurs of religion and of prostrate adoration, the next moment revolting to perilous retrospects of her treacherous happiness—the recognition by shining gleams, through the very storm and darkness evoked by her earthly sensibilities, of a sensibility deeper far in its ground, and that trembled towards holier objects—the lyrical tumult of the changes, the hope, the tears, the rapture, the penitence, the despair—place the reader in tumultuous sympathy with the poor, distracted nun."—DE QUINCEY: Essays on the Poets, 163. See PORSON, RICHARD, below, No. 25.

7. THE DUNCIAD.

For the history of the Dunciad we refer the reader to Pope's Dedication of the poem to Lord Middlesex, (written in the name of Savage,) and the Prolegomena of Scriblerus, the Hypercritics of Aristarchus, and Notes Variorum, which preface and accompany the text. As we have seen on a preceding page, whilst the first three Books were first pub. in 1728, the Fourth Book was not added until 1741; and Warton thought it so unequally yoked with its predecessors that in his edit. of Pope's works he published the first three books separately, in the Appendix. De Quincey calls the First Book "by far the most brilliant and the weightiest of his works."—Encyc. Brit.

It was in the edition of 1743 that Theobald was dethroned and Cibber reigned in his stead. The want of wisdom displayed in these coronations has been already animadverted upon on a preceding page. (See CIBBER, COLLEY.) Mr. Cibber, a man had in great reputation among the wits for his quickness of parts, had in 1740 pub. an Apology for his Life; in 1742 he paid his compliments to the author of the Dunciad, in his Letter from Mr. Cibber to Mr. Pope, inquiring into the Motives that might induce him, in his Satirical Works, to be so frequently fond of Mr. Cibber's Name, (8vo; 2d ed., same year;) in 1744 he recognized his installation by Another Occasional Letter from Mr. Cibber to Mr. Pope, wherein the New Hero's Preferment to his Throne in the Dunciad seems not to be Accepted; and the Author of that Poem his more rightful Claim to it is Asserted; with an Expostulatory Address to the Rev. Mr. W[arburto]n, Author of the New Preface, and Adviser in the curious Improvements of that Satire, 8vo. The command of a battery so formidable gave Warburton a great advantage in his literary skirmishes:

"I thought," says Lowth, "you might possibly whip me at the cart's tail in a note in the 'Divine Legation,' the ordinary place of your literary execution; or pillory me in the 'Dunciad,' another engine which, as legal proprietor, you have very ingeniously and judiciously applied to the same purpose; or perhaps have ordered me a kind of Bridewell correction, by one of your beadles, in a pamphlet."—Lowth's Letter to Warburton, 1765 8vo, 4.

"I cannot but concur in a suspicion which Mr. Croker has communicated to me," says Mr. Cunningham, "that Pope had planned a Dunciad long before Theobald's offence, with Eusden, or Cibber, or some one not less notorious, for the hero of his poem."—Johnson's Life of Pope, 130, n.

"No one," says Richardson, "was ever more tender and sore to raillery than Pope, who was so great a master of it, nor consequently more resentful: too strong a proof of this was his long affair with Colley Cibber."—Richardsoniana, 1776, 8vo, 311.

But let us look a little into the plan and execution of this famous satire:

"Of 'The Dunciad,' the hint is confessedly taken from Dryden's 'MacFlecknoe;' but the plan is so enlarged and diversified as justly to claim the praise of an original, and affords perhaps the best specimen that has yet appeared of personal satire ludicrously pompous. . . . The beauties of this poem are well known; its chief fault is the grossness of its images. Pope and Swift had an unnatural delight in ideas physically impure, such as every other tongue utters with unwillingness, and of which every ear shrinks from the mention. But even this fault, offensive as it is, may be forgiven for the excellence of other passages, such as the formation and dissolution of Moore, the account of the Traveller, the misfortune of the Florist, and the crowded thoughts and stately numbers which dignify the concluding paragraphs. The alterations which have been made in 'The Dunciad,' not always for the better, require that it should be published, as in the present collection, with all its varieties. . . . If it had been possible for those who were attacked to conceal their pain and their resentment, 'The Dunciad' might have made its way very slowly in the world."—Johnson: Life of Pope, 54, 130, 131.

But to conceal "pain and resentment" under such provocation was "too much to expect from flesh and blood:"

"The thong with which he lashed them was dreadful; he fired upon that howling crew such shafts of flame and poison, he slew and wounded so fiercely, that in reading 'The Dunciad' and the prose lampoons of Pope, one feels disposed to side against the ruthless little tyrant, at least to pity those wretched little folks upon whom he was so unmerciful.'"—Thackeray: English Humourists, ed. 1858, 228.

"Some one said to Lord Chesterfield, he wondered Pope was not beaten for his personality in his satires. Lord Chesterfield said, 'What was everybody's business is no one's business.'"—Horace Walpole: MS. Note quoted in Mitford's Gray, v. 182, but taken by us, as are many of these illustrations, from Cunningham's ed. of Johnson's Lives, (see supra.)

"There is a general outcry against that part of the poem which is thought an abuse on the Duke of Chandos. Other parts are quarrelled with as obscure and inharmonious; and I am told there is an advertisement that promises a publication of Mr. Pope's Epistle versified. . . . I am surprised Mr. Pope is not weary of making enemies."—Dr. Delany to Sir Thomas Hanmer, 23d Dec. 1731: Hanmer's Corresp., 217.

"He [Dryden] died, nevertheless, in a good old age, possessed of the kingdom of Wit, and was succeeded by King Alexander, surnamed Pope. This prince enjoyed the crown many years, and is thought to have stretched the prerogative much farther than his predecessor. He is said to have been exceedingly jealous of the affections of his subjects, and to have employed various spies, by whom if he was informed of the least suggestion against his title, he never failed of branding the accused person with the word dunce on his forehead in large letters; after which the unhappy culprit was obliged to lay by his pen forever, for no bookseller would venture to print a word that he wrote. He did indeed put a total restraint on the liberty of the press; for no person durst read anything which was writ without his license and approbation; and this license he granted only to four during his reign, namely, to the celebrated Dr. Swift, to the ingenious Dr. Young, to Dr. Arbuthnot, and to one Mr. Gay, four of his principal courtiers and favourites. But, without diving any deeper into his character, we must allow that King Alexander had great merit as a writer, and his title to the kingdom of Wit was better founded, at least, than his enemies have pretended."—Fielding: Covent Garden Journal, No. 23, Saturday, March 21, 1752.

"The Dunciad has splendid passages; but in general it is dull, heavy, and mechanical."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Eng. Poets, Lect. IV.

De Quincey considers the Dunciad as worthy of

"the everlasting admiration of posterity, the very greatest of Pope's works; a monument of satirical power the greatest which man has produced, not excepting the MacFlecknoe of Dryden. . . . With all its defects of plan, the poem, [Book the Fourth,] as to execution, is superior to all which Pope has done; the composition is much superior to that of the Essay on Man, and more profoundly poetic. The parodies drawn from Milton, as also in the former books, have a beauty and effect which cannot be expressed."—Encyc. Brit.

"'The Dunciad' is blemished by the offensive images of the games; but the poetry appears to me admirable; and though the fourth book has obscurities, I prefer it to the three others: it has descriptions not surpassed by any poet that ever existed, and which surely a writer merely ingenious will never equal. The lines on Italy, on Venice, on Convents, have all the grace for which I contend as distinct from poetry, though united with the most beautiful."—Horace Walpole to J. Pinkerton, June 26, 1785: Letters, ed. 1861, viii. 566.

Mr. Thackeray is eloquent in his commendation of the concluding lines of the Fourth Book:

"No poet's verse ever mounted higher than that wonderful flight with which the 'Dunciad' concludes: ['She comes, she comes,' &c.] In these astonishing lines Pope reaches, I think, to the very greatest height which his sublime art has attained, and shows himself the equal of all poets of all times."—English Humourists, 230–231.

"Can you be fond of these? Of Pope I might; at least I might love his genius, his wit, his greatness, his sensibility; with a certain conviction that at some fancied slight, some sneer which he imagined, he would turn upon me and stab me."—Thackeray: George the Second.

"The Dunciad of Mr. Pope is an everlasting monument of how much the most correct, as well as the most elegant and harmonious, of all the English poets, had been hurt by the criticisms of the lowest and most contemptible authors."—Adam Smith: The Theory of Moral Sentiments, Part 3, chap. ii.: Of Duty.

Boswell is honest enough to quote a remark of his great preceptor which does not place the pupil and narrator in the most dignified position:

"Johnson . . . repeated to us, in his forcible, melodious manner, the concluding lines of the Dunciad. While he was talking loudly in praise of these lines, one of the company [which one?] ventured to say, 'Too fine for such a poem: a poem on what?' Johnson (with a disdainful look), 'Why, on dunces. It was worth while being a dunce then. Ah, sir, hadst thou lived in those days?'"

On another occasion Johnson suggested that Boswell had lost his chance of immortality by not having flourished in the days of the Dunciad. See Boswell, by Croker, ed. 1848, r. 8vo, 203.

An eminent critic of our day thus refers to one of his favourite passages in the Dunciad:

"It is remarkable that Mr. Campbell, in selecting proofs from Pope, (whom he most justly defends from all the puny attacks of taste vitiated by theory, and judgment perverted by paradox,) should, to show his power of picturesque description, have omitted the finest example of all, the Italy in his 'Dunciad:'

'To happy convents, buried deep in vines,
Where slumber abbots purple as their wines,'" &c.

—Lord Brougham: Lives of the Men of Letters of the Time of George III., ed. 1855, 370, n.

8. An Essay on Man.

That the germ of this poem was supplied by Lord Bolingbroke is not to be doubted:

"In the year 1763, being at London, I was carried by Dr. John Blair, prebendary of Westminster, to dine at old Lord Bathurst's, where we found the late Mr. Mallet, Sir James Porter, &c. The conversation turning on Mr. Pope, Lord Bathurst told us that the 'Essay on Man' was originally composed by Lord Bolingbroke in prose, and that Mr. Pope did no more than put it into verse; that he had read Lord Bolingbroke's manuscript in his own handwriting, and remembered well that he was at a loss whether most to admire the elegance of Lord Bolingbroke's prose or the beauty of Mr. Pope's verse. When Lord Bathurst told this, Mr. Mallet bade me attend, and remember this remarkable piece of information, as by the course of nature I might survive his Lordship and be a witness of his having said so."—Dr. Hugh Blair to Boswell, Sept. 21, 1779.

"In the conclusion ['Come then, my friend!'] it is sufficiently acknowledged that the doctrine of the 'Essay on Man' was received from Bolingbroke. . . . The 'Essay' plainly appears the fabric of a poet: what Bolingbroke supplied could be only the first principles; the order, illustration, and embellishments must all be Pope's."—Johnson: Life of Pope, 67.

The author gives us the reason for not affixing his name to the three first Epistles:

"But truly I had not the least thought of stealing applause by suppressing my name to that Essay. I wanted only to hear truth, and was more afraid of my partial friends than enemies."—Pope to Mr. Duncombe, 20th Oct. 1734.

He certainly sought to elicit the "truth:"

"Pray what is your opinion of it? I hear some cry it extremely up, others think it obscure in part, and some (of whom I am sure you are not one) have said it is mine. I think I could show you some faults in it, and believe you can show me more: upon the whole, it is allowed to have merit, and I think so myself."—Pope to Richardson Senior.

At least in one memorable instance Pope heard an honest opinion on the subject:

"About this time Pope, whom he [Mallet] visited familiarly, published his 'Essay on Man,' but concealed the author, and when Mallet entered one day, Pope asked him slightly what there was new. Mallet told him that the newest piece was something called an 'Essay on Man,' which he had inspected idly, and, seeing the utter inability of the author, who had neither skill in writing nor knowledge of his subject, had tossed it away. Pope, to punish his self-conceit, told him the secret."—Johnson's Life of Mallet.

"I chose verse, and even rhyme," says Pope, "for two reasons. The one will appear obvious; that principles, maxims, or precepts, so written, both strike the reader more strongly at first, and are more easily retained by him afterwards. The other may seem odd, but it is true. I found I could express them more shortly this way than in prose itself; and nothing is more certain than that much of the force, as well as the grace, of arguments or instructions, depends on their conciseness."—Pref. to Essay on Man.

The Essay was translated into French prose, and afterwards, by Resnel, with some remarks, into French verse. Both of these versions were answered by the excellent Crousaz: the first in his Examen de l'Essai sur l'Homme, poëme de M. Pope, Lausanne, 1737, (see CARTER, ELIZABETH); the last, in his Commentaire sur la Traduction en vers de M. l'Abbé du Resnel de l'Essai de M. Pope, Geneva, 1738, 12mo; trans. into English, 1741, 8vo. We also notice Expressions, Similes, and Sentiments in Palingenius, translated and improved by Mr. Pope in his Essay on Man, 8vo, (see M. Palingenius, Zodiacus Vitæ, id est De Hominis Vita, Studio ac Moribus optime instituendis libri xii., Roter., 1722, sm. 8vo;) Commentary upon Mr. Pope's Four Ethic Epistles, entitled an Essay on Man, Lon., 1738, 12mo; A View of the Necessitarian or Best Scheme: freed from the Objections of M. Crousaz in his Examination of Mr. Pope's Essay on Man, 1739, 8vo. But Pope found his ablest ally in an ancient enemy: William Warburton, who had supplied some of the best notes to Theobald's edition of Shakspeare, pub. in opposition to Pope's essay in that line,—who had charged Pope with borrowing the labours of others for want of genius to produce something equally good,—now took up the cudgels in defence of the object of his late hostility, and carried the war into Africa by undertaking to prove not only that the Essay was not inimical to the cause of religion, but, on the contrary, was a laboured and systematic defence of truths most important to the welfare of man. His Letters to this effect, originally contributed in 1739 to the Republic of Letters and The Works of the Learned, were pub. in a collective form in 1740, 12mo, under the title of A Vindication of Mr. Pope's Essay on Man, by the Author of the Divine Legation; and in 1742, 8vo, he gave to the world A Critical and Philosophical Commentary on Mr. Pope's Essay on Man; in which is contained a Vindication of the said Essay from the Misrepresentations of Mr. De Resnel, the French Translator, and Mr. De Crousaz, . . . the Commentator, 1742, 8vo.

Pope received his champion with open arms.

"I know I meant just what you explain," he writes to him, in acknowledgment of his Letters; "but I did not explain my own meaning as well as you. You understand me as well as I do myself; but you express me better than I could express myself."—April 11, 1739.

But Richardson the younger tells a very different tale:

"Warburton's Discovery of the 'regularity' of Pope's Essay on Criticism, and the whole scheme of his Essay on Man, I happen to know to be mere absurd refinement in creating conformities, and this from Pope himself, though he saw fit to adopt them afterwards. . . . I know that he never dreamed of the scheme he afterwards adopted; but he had taken terror about the clergy, and Warburton himself, at the general alarm of its fatalism and deistical tendency, of which my father and I talked with him frequently at Twickenham, without his appearing to understand it, or ever thinking to alter those passages which we suggested."—Richardsoniana, 264.

"The positions which he transmitted from Bolingbroke," says Johnson, "he seems not to have understood, and was pleased with an interpretation that made them orthodox."—Life of Pope, 109.

Dugald Stewart remarks that

"The author of the Essay on Man, from a want of precision in his metaphysical ideas, has unconsciously fallen into various expressions, equally inconsistent with each other and with his own avowed opinions," and cites passages in illustration.

Referring also to Pope's supposed "secret stab at Newton and Clarke" in the Dunciad,

> "Thrust some Mechanic Cause into His place,
> Or bind in matter, or diffuse in space,"

Mr. Stewart continues:

"How little was it suspected by the poet, when this sarcasm escaped him, that the charge of Spinozism and Pantheism was afterwards to be brought against himself, for the sublimest passage to be found in his writings!—

> 'All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
> Whose body Nature is, and God the soul.
> * * * * * * * *
> Lives through all Life, extends through all extent, > Spreads undivided, operates unspent.'"
> Prelim. Dissert. Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., 128, 147.

Mr. Stewart quotes the lines of the historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire:

"The poverty of human language, and the obscurity of human ideas, make it difficult to speak worthily of the Great First Cause; and our most religious poets, (particularly Pope and Thomson,) in striving to express the presence and energy of the Deity in every part of the universe, deviate unwarily into images which require a favourable construction. But these writers deserve that favour by the sublime manner in which they celebrate the Great Father of the universe, and by those effusions of love and gratitude which are inconsistent with the materialist's system."—GIBBON: Miscell. Works, ii. 509, 510.

"The 'Essay on Man' was a work of great labour and long consideration, but certainly not the happiest of Pope's performances. The subject is perhaps not very proper for poetry, and the poet was not sufficiently master of his subject. Metaphysical morality was to him a new study: he was proud of his acquisitions, and, supposing himself master of great secrets, was in haste to teach what he had learned. . . . The vigorous contraction of some thoughts, the luxuriant amplification of others, the incidental illustrations, and sometimes the dignity, sometimes the softness, of the verses, enchain philosophy, suspend criticism, and oppress judgment by overpowering pleasure. This is true of many paragraphs: yet, if I had undertaken to exemplify Pope's felicity of composition before a rigid critic, I should not select the 'Essay on Man,' for it contains more lines unnecessarily laboured, more harshness of diction, more thoughts imperfectly expressed, more levity without elegance, and more heaviness without strength, than will easily be found in all his othe. works."—JOHNSON: Life of Pope, 131, 133.

See, also, Johnson's remarks in the Rambler, No. 92.

"His Essay on Man was but one link in a general course which he had projected of moral philosophy, here and there pursuing his themes into the fields of metaphysics, but no farther in either field of morals or metaphysics than he could make compatible with a poetical treatment."—DE QUINCEY. Encyc. Brit.

"If the question were asked, what ought to have been the best among Pope's poems, most people would answer, the Essay on Man. If the question were asked, what is the worst, all people of judgment would say, the Essay on Man. Whilst yet in its rudiments, this poem claimed the first place by the promise of its subject; when finished, by the utter failure of its execution it fell into the last."—DE QUINCEY: Essays on the Poets, 189.

But how great critics will differ!

"The success of this enterprise was astonishing. Be the philosophy what it may, the poem revived to the latest age of poetry the phenomena of the first, when precept and practice were modulated into verse, that they might write themselves in every brain and live upon every tongue."—PROF. JOHN WILSON: Blackw. Mag., lvii. 382.

"The Essay on Man is not Pope's best work. . . . 'He spins the thread of his verbosity finer than the staple of his argument.' All that he says, 'the very words, and to the selfsame tune,' would prove just as well that whatever is is wrong, as that whatever is is right."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Eng. Poets, Lect IV.

Certainly it is only fair to allow Pope to speak for himself respecting the theology of his poem. He writes to Racine,—and the letter is of peculiar value as the deliberate expression of his religious sentiments in general,—

"J'ai reçu enfin votre poeme sur la religion; le plaisir qui me causa cette lecture eût été sans mélange si je n'avois eu le chagrin de voir que vous m'imputiez des principes que j'abhorre. Je puis vous assurer, Mons., que votre entière ignorance de notre langue m'a été beaucoup moins fatale, que la connoissance imparfaite qu'en avoient mes traducteurs, qui les a empêchés de pénétrer mes véritables sentimens. Toutes les beautés de la versification de M. D. R. ont été moins honorables à mon poëme que ces méprises continuelles sur mes raisonnemens et sur ma doctrine ne lui ont été préjudiciables. Vous verrez ces méprises relevées et refutées dans l'ouvrage Anglois que j'ai l'honneur de vous envoyer. Cet ouvrage est un commentaire critique et philosophique par le savant auteur de la Divine Légation de Moïse. Je me flatte que le Chevalier de Ramsay, rempli comme il est d'une zèle ardent pour la vérité, voudra bien vous en expliquer le contenu. Alors je m'en rapporterai à votre justice; et je me flatte que tous vos soupçons seront dissipés. En attendant ces éclaircissemens, je ne saurois me refuser le plaisir de répondre nettement à ce que vous desirez savoir de moi. Je déclare donc hautement et très-sincèrement que mes sentimens sont diamétralement opposés à ceux de Spinoza, et même à ceux de Leibnitz, puisqu'ils sont parfaitement conformés à ceux de M. Pascal et de M. l'Archevêque de Fénélon, et que je ferai gloire d'imiter la docilité du dernier, en soumettant toujours toutes mes opinions particulières aux décisions de l'Eglise. Je suis &c. A Londres, le 1 Septemb., 1742."—Œuvres de Racine.

9. TRANSLATION OF HOMER.

Of the Iliad, published, as we have seen, in 6 vols. 4to, at one guinea per vol., 654 copies were subscribed for by 575 subscribers. Of the Odyssey, published in 5 vols. 4to, 574 copies were subscribed for, at one guinea per vol. The total sum received for subscriptions and copyright was £8996 1s., of which Pope paid £800 to Browne and Fenton, leaving him a clear gain of £8196.

Mr. De Quincey prefaces the above figures by the assertion that "this was unquestionably the greatest literary labour, and profit, ever executed, not excepting the most lucrative of Sir Walter Scott's, if due allowance be made for the altered value of money."—Encyc. Brit.

"The most lucrative literary labour of Sir Walter Scott" is thus referred to by his son-in-law, Mr. Lockhart:

"The Napoleon (first and second editions) produced for them a sum which it even now startles me to mention,—£18,000."—Life of Scott, chap. lxxiii.

The topic of valuable copyrights—especially of some late American publications—is one of interest and extent; but it does not at this time claim our attention.

Swift was probably censured as extravagant in his calculations when he declared that Pope "should not begin to print until he had a thousand guineas for him in subscriptions;" how greatly, then, must the result have surprised the authors and publishers of the day! A little exultation on the part of the successful poet and his champion may readily be excused:

"But (thanks to Homer) since I live and thrive Indebted to no prince or peer alive."
POPE: 2d Epist. of 2d Book of Horace.

"Appealing to the nation's taste,
Above the reach of want is placed:
By Homer dead was taught to thrive,
Which Homer never could alive."
SWIFT: A Libel on Dr. Delany.

But Pope did not commence his arduous enterprise without misgivings:

"What terrible moments does one feel," he exclaimed, at a later day, "after one has engaged for a large work! In the beginning of my translating the Iliad, I wished anybody would hang me, a hundred times. It sat so heavily on my mind at first, that I often used to dream of it, and do sometimes still."

"He used to dream that he was engaged in a long journey, puzzled which way to take, and full of fears that he should never get to the end of it."—SPENCE.

He soon became reconciled to his task:

"When I fell into the method of translating thirty or forty verses before I got up, and piddled with it the rest of the morning, it went on easy enough; and when I was thoroughly got into the way of it, I did the rest with pleasure."—Spence's Anecdotes, by Singer.

Encouraged by Sir Richard Steele and by Addison, (for, whatever view may be taken of the circumstances attending the Tickell (?) version of the first book of the Iliad, he was unquestionably encouraged by Addison: see the Freeholder, No. 40,) he girded up his loins, and, as he tells us above, after a time addressed himself with energy to his work,—and "did it with pleasure;" but how? It is certain that he undertook to give an English version of the greatest Greek poet whilst conscious of a very imperfect knowledge of his original. Well might he despond at the prospect. Broome writes, so late as 1727, fourteen years after the commencement and two years after the completion, of Pope's Grecian labours,

"All the crime that I have committed is saying that he is no master of Greek; and I am so confident of this, that if he can translate ten lines of Eustathius I'll own myself unjust and unworthy."—Letter to Fenton, 5th June, 1727, first pub. in Cunningham's ed. of Johnson's Poets, iii. 29, n.

Of modern critics, Mr. De Quincey, whose peculiar felicity it often is to know what others can only surmise, and to be able to prove where the less fortunate are obliged to "guess," in this instance is so modest as to avow his belief only of Pope's "thorough ignorance of Greek when he first commenced his task." But surely this is very loose criticism! Between "thorough ignorance of Greek" and the amount of erudition necessary to a faithful translation of Homer, there are many gradations. But let us cite some opinions upon Pope's performance, which is the best evidence of his philological abilities. Mr. De Quincey, whose curious theory of the translation we have no time to expose, exhibits his usual audacity in the assertion that "Criticism has not succeeded in fixing upon Pope any errors of ignorance. His deviations from Homer were uniformly the result of imperfect sympathy with the naked simplicity of the antique, and therefore wilful deviations, not (like those of his more pretending competitors, Addison and Tickell) pure blunders of misapprehension."—Encyc. Brit.

One of the earliest critics of Pope's labour,—Dennis,—as we have seen, (supra,) gave his opinion to the world. Another—the great Bentley—gave his to Pope; and the world soon heard it. At a dinner at Dr. Mead's, Pope was so unwise as to invite the attack:

"Pope, desirous of his opinion of the translation, addressed him thus: 'Dr. Bentley, I ordered my bookseller to send you your books; I hope you received them.' Bentley, who had purposely avoided saying any thing about Homer, pretended not to understand him, and asked, 'Books! books! what books?' 'My Homer,' replied Pope, 'which you did me the honour to subscribe for.' 'Oh,' said Bentley; 'ay, now I recollect your translation: it is a pretty poem, Mr. Pope; but you must not call it Homer.'"—SIR JOHN HAWKINS.

"The verses are good verses," exclaimed Bentley; "but the work is not Homer: it is Spondanus."

Of course Pope abused his critic, and the latter was duly informed of the reward of his candour. It troubled the great man very little. "Ay, like enough," he replied: "I spoke against his Homer, and the portentous sub never forgives."

On another occasion he is reported to have said, "This man is always abusing me or the King." Bentley died in 1742, and in the same year we have him chronicled in print, in the Fourth Book of the Dunciad, as

"The mighty scholiast, whose unwearied pains
Made Horace dull, and humbled Milton's strains."

It cannot be denied that the satirist was fortunate in his selection of vulnerable points: see BENTLEY, RICHARD, p. 171, ante.

Cowper declares that the Iliad and Odyssey in Pope's hands "have no more the air of antiquity than if he had himself invented them."

A modern critic thus compares Cowper's own version with Pope's:

"Though Cowper has been too literal in his Homer, and too inattentive to the melody of his versification, yet has he infused much more of the simple majesty and manner of the divine bard than Pope, whose splendid and highly ornamented paraphrase is more adapted to the genius of Ovid than of Homer."—DR. DRAKE.

Contrasting Pope's version with that of an earlier translator, Mr. Hallam remarks,

"Chapman's translation, with all its defects, is often exceedingly Homeric; a praise which Pope himself seldom attained."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, ed. 1854, ii. 131.

That Pope profited by the labours of his predecessor is very evident:

"With Chapman . . . he had very frequent consultations, and perhaps never translated any passage till he had read his version, which indeed he has been sometimes suspected of using instead of the original."—JOHNSON: Life of Pope, 28.

"My copy [of Chapman's Homer] once belonged to Pope: in which he has noted many of Chapman's absolute interpolations, extending sometimes to the length of a paragraph of twelve lines. A diligent observer will easily discern that Pope was no careless reader of his rude predecessor. Pope complains that Chapman took advantage of an unmeasurable length of line. But in reality Pope's lines are longer than Chapman's."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ed. 1840, iii. 358.

Our author himself remarks of Chapman,

"He covers his defects with a daring fiery spirit that animates his translation; which is something like what one might imagine Homer himself to have writ before he arrived at years of discretion."—POPE.

"Chapman writes and feels as a poet—as Homer might have written had he lived in England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth."—COLERIDGE.

"The translation of Homer published by George Chapman is one of the greatest treasures the English language can boast."—GODWIN.

"Fiery and eloquent and creative as it is, Chapman's Homer is hard reading now, and sometimes rare. Then [in Pope's day] the book was, for the general capacity, precisely the same thing as if it were not."—PROF. WILSON: Blackw. Mag., lvii. 381.

Johnson tells us that in his time Chapman was "totally neglected;" and this neglect was long continued; but see CHAPMAN, GEORGE, (Hooper's ed.,) supra.

We may remark, in passing, that Chapman's copy of his translation of Homer was sold to Mr. Stevens for 5*s*., and in 1800 passed into the library of Richard Heber; and that Pope's copy of Hobbes's translation of Homer (with MS. annotations by the former) was sold at Edinburgh in 1859 for £3 5*s*. Pope's own MS. copy of his translation of the Iliad, written on the backs of letters and other "accidental fragments of paper," was secured by Bolingbroke, descended from him to Mallet, and has long been in the British Museum. Liberal in some things, Pope was sparing of writing-materials; and even his friend Swift thus adverts to this peculiarity:

"Lend these to paper-sparing Pope,
And when he sits to write,
No letter with an envelope
Could give him more delight."
Advice to the Grub Street Verse-Writers, 1729.

But to return to Pope's translation: of course Lord Byron defends it,—for is it not Pope's?

"One word," he exclaims, "upon his so brutally abused translation of Homer. Dr. Clarke, whose critical exactness is well known, has not been able to point out above three or four mistakes in the sense through the whole Iliad. The real faults of the translation are of a different kind! So says Warton, himself a scholar. It appears by this, then, that he avoided the chief fault of a translator. As to its other faults, they consist in his having made a beautiful English poem of a sublime Greek one. It will always hold. Cowper and all the rest of the blank pretenders may do their worst: they will never wrench Pope from the hands of a single reader of sense and feeling."—Moore's Life of Byron, vol. ii.: Defence of Gilchrist, (suppressed.)

"I have as yet read only to the end of the eighth Iliad; but, as far as I can judge, this is one of the finest translations in the English language; and, what is very extraordinary, it appears to the best advantage when compared with the original. I have read both carefully so far, and written remarks as I went along; and I think I can prove that where Pope has omitted one beauty he has added or improved four. . . . I am just on the point of finishing Homer's Iliad with Pope's translation; which I am sure I need not recommend to you."—DR. DODDRIDGE: Letters to Rev. Mr. Nettleton, Aug. 5, 1725, and Mr. Hughes, Jan. 27, 1726.

"It is certainly," says Johnson, "the noblest version of poetry which the world has ever seen; and its publication must therefore be considered as one of the great events in the annals of learning. . . . The chief help of Pope in this arduous undertaking was drawn from the versions of Dryden. Virgil had borrowed much of his imagery from Homer; and part of the debt was now paid by his translator. Pope searched the pages of Dryden for happy combinations of heroic diction; but it will not be denied that he added much to what he found. He cultivated our language with so much diligence and art that he has left in his Homer a treasure of poetical elegance to posterity. His version may be said to have tuned the English tongue; for since its appearance no writer, however deficient in other powers, has wanted melody. Such a series of lines, so elaborately corrected and so sweetly modulated, took possession of the public ear; the vulgar was enamoured of the poem, and the learned wondered at the translation. . . . It is remarked by Watts that there is scarcely a happy combination of words, or a phrase poetically elegant, in the English language, which Pope has not inserted into his version of Homer. How he obtained possession of so many beauties of speech, it were desirable to know. . . . But in the most general applause discordant voices will always be heard. It has been objected by some, who wish to be numbered among the sons of learning, that Pope's version of Homer is not Homerical; that it exhibits no resemblance of the original and characteristic manner of the father of poetry, as it wants his awful simplicity, his artless grandeur, his unaffected majesty. This cannot be totally denied; but it must be remembered that necessitas quod cogit defendit,—that may be lawfully done which cannot be forborne. . . . Homer doubtless owes to his translation many Ovidian graces not exactly suitable to his character; but to have added can be no great crime, if nothing be taken away. Elegance is surely to be desired, if it be not gained at the expense of dignity. A hero would wish to be loved as well as to be reverenced."—Johnson's Life of Pope, 31, 127, 128, 137.

"[Boswell] mentioned the vulgar saying that Pope's Homer was not a good representation of the original. JOHNSON.—'Sir, it is the greatest work of the kind that has ever been produced.'"—Boswell, by Croker, ed. 1848, 582.

"Homer is the most simple in his style of all the great poets, and resembles most the style of the poetical parts of the Old Testament. They can have no conception of his manner, who are acquainted with him in Mr. Pope's translation only. An excellent poetical performance that translation is, and faithful in the main to the original. In some places it may be thought to have even improved Homer. It has certainly softened some of his rudenesses, and added delicacy and grace to some of his sentiments. But, withal, it is no other than Homer modernised. In the midst of the elegance and luxuriancy of Mr. Pope's language, we lose sight of the old bard's simplicity. I know, indeed, no author to whom it is more difficult to do justice in a translation than Homer."—Hugh Blair's Lects. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, Lect. XLIII.: The Iliad of Homer.

"Pope could not resist his habit of analysis, even in the translation of Homer, who, of all poets, is least disposed to turn aside to speculate. Perhaps these deviations of Pope from the character of his author have contributed to the popularity of the English Iliad."—UGO FOSCOLO: Edin. Rev., Feb. 1818, 461.

"The rights, powers, and pretensions of the sovereigns of Olympus are very clearly described in the XVth book of the Iliad: in the Greek original, I mean; for Mr. Pope, without perceiving it, has improved the theology of Homer."—GIBBON: Decline and Fall, ed. 1837, 12, n.

"Pope's translation is a portrait endowed with every merit excepting that of faithfulness to the original. The verses of Pope accustomed my ear to the sound of poetic harmony."—GIBBON: Memoir of my Life and Writings: Miscell. Works, ed. 1837, 16.

"The English translations by Chapman, Pope, and Cowper must be regarded as failures."—WILLIAM IHRIE, Ph.D., Univ. of Bonn: Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. and Mythol., art. Homer.

"Homer is rapid in his movement; Homer is plain in his words and style; Homer is simple in his ideas; Homer is noble in his manner. Cowper renders him ill because he is slow in his movement and elaborate in his style; Pope renders him ill because he is artificial both in his style and in his words; Chapman renders him ill because he is fantastic in his ideas; Mr. Newman renders him ill because he is odd in his words and ignoble in his manner."—MATTHEW ARNOLD: On Translating Homer.

We wonder what Mr. Arnold thinks of Earl Derby's Translation of the Iliad into English Blank Verse?

Lord Macaulay remarks of the rival versions of Tickell (First Book of the Iliad) and Pope,

"Neither of the rivals can be said to have translated the Iliad," &c.—Essays, ed. 1854, iii. 429. See, also, 434; i. 323.

Wordsworth declares that Pope's translation of the celebrated moonlight scene in the Iliad is "absurd;" for which blunt assertion Prof. Wilson, in Blackwood's Magazine, (xxviii. 874,) takes him to task. But we have neither time nor space for further quotations, and must refer the reader to the General Index to Blackwood's Magazine, vols. i.–l., 1855; and especially to Wilson's Homer and his Translators, being vol. viii., 1857, of the Works of Professor Wilson, edited by his son-in-law, Professor Ferrier. 10. POPE'S VERSIFICATION.

Our author's poetical education commenced in early youth and under parental instruction:

"Mr. Pope's father (who was an honest merchant, and dealt in Hollands wholesale) was no poet, but he used to set him to make English verses when very young. He was pretty difficult in being pleased, and used often to send him back to new-turn them. 'These are not good rhymes;' for that was my husband's word for verses."—MR. POPE'S MOTHER: Spence's Anecdotes, by Singer.

He profited by his lessons:

"In versification," he remarked, "there is a sensible difference between softness and sweetness, that I could distinguish from a boy."—Ibid.

"At fifteen years of age," he tells us, "I got acquainted with Mr. Walsh. He encouraged me much, and used to tell me that there was one way left of excelling; for, though we have several great poets, we never had any one great poet that was correct. He ended his remarks by desiring me to make accuracy my study and aim." See the conclusion of the Essay on Criticism.

Dryden admits this general want of correctness.

"It is enough for those who make poetry the business of their lives to learn that correct, yet, excepting Virgil, I never met with any which was so in any language."—Dryden's Defence of the Essay on Dramatic Poetry.

"Mr. Pope wrote verses imitative of sounds so early as in this epic poem, [Alcander, "commenced a little after I was twelve."]

'Shields, helms, and swords all jangle as they hang,
And sound formidinous with angry clang,' was a couplet of this nature in it."—Spence, by Singer.

"Homer is perpetually applying the sound to the sense. This, indeed, is one of the most exquisite beauties of poetry, and attainable by very few. I know only of Homer eminent for it in the Greek, and Virgil in Latin. I am sensible it is what may sometimes happen by chance, when a writer is warm and fully possest of his image; however, it may reasonably be believed they designed this, in whose verses it so manifestly appears in a superior degree to all others. Few readers have the ears to be judges of it; but those who have will see I have endeavoured at this beauty."—POPE: Pref. to Homer.

See Johnson's remarks on this subject in the Rambler, No. 92.

"I learned versification wholly from Dryden's works, who had improved it much beyond any of our former poets, and would, probably, have brought it to perfection, had not he been unhappily obliged to write so often in haste."—POPE: Spence, by Singer.

Yet Pope's most successful poems were written with great rapidity:

"The things that I have written fastest have always pleased the most. I wrote the Essay on Criticism fast, for I had digested all the matter in prose before I began upon it in verse. The Rape of the Lock was written fast, all the machinery was added afterwards; and the making that, and what was published before, hit so well together, is, I think, one of the greatest proofs of judgment of anything I ever did. I wrote most of the Iliad fast, a great deal of it on journeys, from the pocket-Homer on that shelf there, and often forty or fifty verses in a morning in bed. The Dunciad cost me as much pains as any thing I ever wrote."—Ibid.

But he tells us, in other places,

"The sense of my faults made me correct; besides that, it was as pleasant to me to correct as to write."—Pref. to Works, 1717, 4to.

Correctness he soon attained. In the Preface to the Pastorals, written at sixteen, we are told,

"Notwithstanding the early time of their production, the author esteemed these as the most correct in the versification, and musical in the numbers, of all his works. . . . In a letter of his to Mr. Walsh about this time, we find an enumeration of several niceties in versification, which perhaps have never been strictly observed in any English poem except in these Pastorals."

Lord Lansdowne, in a letter written when Pope was about seventeen, remarks,

"If he goes on as he has begun in his Pastoral way, as Virgil first tried his strength, we may hope to see English poetry vie with the Roman."

And Walsh, whom Dryden calls the best critic of his age, writes to Wycherley in July, 1705, four years before the Pastorals were printed,

"It is not flattery at all to say that Virgil had written nothing so good at his age." See notice of the Pastorals, (ante.)

Among early eulogies of Pope's versification are the following:

"'Tis true, if finest notes alone could show
(Tuned justly high, or regularly low)
That we should fame to these mere vocals give,
Pope more than we can offer should receive;
For when some gliding river is his theme,
His lines run smoother than the smoothest stream," &c.
H. STANHOPE: Progress of Dulness, 1728, 12mo.

Thomas Cooke, who treated Pope's Homer with little respect, (see p. 422, supra,) in his strictures on the translator thus does justice to his merits as a poet:

"But in his other works what beauties shine,
While sweetest music dwells on every line!
These he admired, on these he stamped his praise,
And bade them live to brighten future days."
Battle of the Poets, 1725, fol. 15.

But Dennis professes no such admiration for the monotonous excellence:

"Boileau's Pegasus has all his paces; the Pegasus of Pope, like a Kentish post-horse, is always upon the Canterbury." —Remarks upon several Passages in the Preliminaries to the Dunciad, 1729, 8vo.

"He used almost always the same fabric of verse; and, indeed, by those few essays which he made of any other, he did not enlarge his reputation. Of this uniformity the certain consequence was readiness and dexterity. By perpetual practice, language had, in his mind, a systematical arrangement; having always the same use for words, he had words so selected and combined as to be ready at his call."—JOHNSON: Life of Pope, 112.

"Sir, a thousand years may elapse before there shall appear another man with a power of versification equal to that of Pope." —DR. JOHNSON: Boswell's Life, ch. lxx:.

"But ever since Pope spoiled the ears of the town
With his cuckoo-song verses, half up and half down."
LEIGH HUNT: Feast of the Poets.

"Considering the quantity he has written, we should think him unfortunate in the selection of his verse, did we not also consider the nature of his subjects. These, being for the most part satirical or argumentative, were no doubt better managed in rhyme, which, pointed, antithetical, sententious in its structure, gave additional keenness to his raillery and force to his argument. Shackled as this kind of verse is by its own laws, in which respect it resembles the French 'monotony in wire' more than any other, we still think Pope has not relieved it by all the variety of which it is so susceptible. Every line with him seems to 'hang self-balanced on its own centre,' every pause is distributed by one uniform rule, every couplet shoots up its own sentence. This is artificial, not natural, harmony, and the ear soon becomes wearied with such a regular recurrence of sounds and pauses."—WM. H. PRESCOTT: N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1821, 471–472.

"Dryden was the master of harmonious versification, much beyond Pope, who was too monotonous for real harmony. Nothing that Pope has written is equal to the beginning of 'The Hind and the Panther."—SIR J. MACKINTOSH: Life, ii., chap. vii.

"The mellifluence of Pope, as Johnson called it, has the defect of monotony. Exquisite in the sweet rising and falling of its clauses, it seldom or never takes the ear prisoner by a musical surprise. If Pope be the nightingale of our verse, he displays none of the irregular and unexpected gush of the songster. He has no variations. The tune is delicate, but not natural. It reminds us of a bird, all over brilliant, which pipes its one lay in a golden cage and has forgotten the green wood in the luxury of confinement. But Dryden's versification has the freedom and the freshness of the fields. Pope's modulation is of the ear; Dryden's, of the subject."—REV. R. A. WILLMOTT: Pleasures, &c. of Lit., ed. 1866, 79.

"Mr. Pope's versification has a peculiar character. It is flowing and smooth in the highest degree, far more laboured and correct than that of any who went before him. . . . He introduced one considerable change into verse by totally throwing aside the triplets, or three lines rhyming together, in which Mr. Dryden abounded. Dryden's versification, however, has very great merit, and, like all his productions, has much spirit, mixed with carelessness. If not so smooth and correct as Pope's, it is, however, more varied and easy."—Hugh Blair's Lects. on Rhetoric, &c., Lect. XXXVIII.

"An artificial style of composition can please only when it has the exquisite grace and finish and clear-pointed thought of Pope, or the power and dignity of Milton."—JOHN FOSTER: Life and Corresp., ed. 1856, ii. 119.

"The compact and pointed diction which adds zest to the verses of Pope and Boileau."—LORD MACAULAY: Criticisms on the Principal Italian Writers, No. 1, Dante, Knight's Quar. Mag., Jan. 1824, and Essays, N. York, 1860, i. 60.

Lord Macaulay, giving the history of the heroic couplet, remarks,

"Like other mechanical arts, it was gradually improved by means of many experiments and many failures. It was reserved for Pope to discover the trick, to make himself complete master of it, and to teach it to everybody else. From the time when his Pastorals appeared, heroic versification became matter of rule and compass, and, before long, all artists were on a level. Hundreds of dunces who never blundered on one happy thought or expression were able to write reams of couplets, which, as far as euphony was concerned, could not be distinguished from those of Pope himself, and which very clever writers of the reign of Charles the Second—Rochester, for example, or Marvell, or Oldham—would have contemplated with admiring despair."—Crit. and Histor. Essays, ed. 1854, iii. 365.

See, also, his lordship's remarks under HOOLE, JOHN, (supra.)

"Pope gave our heroic couplet its strictest melody and tersest expression. D'un mot mis en sa place il enseigne le pouvoir. If his contemporaries forgot other poets in admiring him, let him not be robbed of his just fame on pretence that a part of it was superfluous. The public ear was long fatigued with repetitions of his manner; but if we place ourselves in the situation of those to whom his brilliancy, succinctness, and animation were wholly new, we cannot wonder at their being captivated to the fondest admiration. In order to do justice to Pope, we should forget his imitators, if that were possible; but it is easier to remember than to forget by an effort,—to acquire associations than to shake them off. Every one may recollect how often the most beautiful air has palled upon his ear, and grown insipid, from being played or sung by vulgar musicians. It is the same thing with regard to Pope's versification. That his peculiar rhythm and manner are the very best in the whole range of our poetry need not be asserted. He has a gracefully peculiar manner, though it is not calculated to be an universal one; and where, indeed, shall we find the style of poetry that could be pronounced an exclusive model for every composer? His pauses have little variety, and his phrases are too much weighed in the balance of antithesis. But let us look to the spirit that points his antithesis, and to the rapid precision of his thoughts, and we shall forgive him for being too antithetic and sententious."—Campbell's Specimens of the British Poets.

Hazlitt does not share in the general enthusiasm on this subject:

"His excellence is by no means faultlessness. If he had no great faults, he is full of little errors. His grammatical construction is often lame and imperfect. . . . Pope's rhymes are constantly defective, being rhymes to the eye instead of the ear; and this to a greater degree not only than in later but than in preceding writers. The praise of his versification must be confined to its uniform smoothness and harmony. In the translation of the Iliad, which has been considered as his master-piece in style and execution, he continually changes the tenses in the same sentence for the purpose of rhyme, which shows either a want of technical resources, or great inattention to punctilious exactness."—Lects. on the Eng. Poets, Lect. IV.

"Pope's rhymes too often supply the defect of his reasons."—ARCHBISHOP WHATELY.

11. POPE'S GENERAL MERITS AS A POET.

Would that we had space for Johnson's admirable comparison between Pope and Dryden!—but this must be enjoyed by the reader in the original, whilst we are forced to content ourselves with the citation of a few lines from the conclusion of the biography:

"Pope had, in proportions very nicely adjusted to each other, all the qualities that constitute genius. He had Invention, by which new trains of events are formed and new scenes of imagery displayed, as in 'The Rape of the Lock,' and by which extrinsic and adventitious embellishments and illustrations are connected with a known subject, as in the 'Essay on Criticism.' He had Imagination, which strongly impresses the writer's mind, and enables him to convey to the reader the various forms of nature, incidents of life, and energies of passion, as in his 'Eloisa,' 'Windsor Forest,' and the 'Ethic Epistles.' He had Judgment, which selects from life or nature what the present purpose requires, and by separating the essence of things from its concomitants, often makes the representation more powerful than the reality; and he had colours of language always before him, ready to decorate his matter with every grace of elegant expression, as when he accommodates his diction to the wonderful simplicity of Homer's sentiments and descriptions."—JOHNSON: Life of Pope, 135.

"Johnson said his characters of men were admirably drawn; those of women not so well."—Boswell, by Croker, ed. 1848, 203.

"When Johnson had finished his preface to Shakspeare, Mr. Thrale said, 'Oh, sir, you have driven Pope quite into the shade.' 'I fear not, sir,' was our doctor's reply: 'the little fellow has done wonders.'"—Mrs. Thrale's note, in her copy of Johnson's Lives: quoted in Cat. of W. H. Burton's Library, N. York, 1860, 126.

"I am bound to acquiesce in Johnson's opinion of Pope, because it has always been my own. I could never agree with those who preferred him to Dryden; nor with others (I have known such, and persons of taste and discernment too) who could not allow him to be a poet at all. He was certainly a mechanical maker of verses, and in every line he wrote we see indubitable marks of the most indefatigable industry and labour. Writers who find it necessary to make strenuous and painful exertions are generally as phlegmatic as they are correct; but Pope was in this respect exempted from the common lot of authors of that class. With the unwearied application of a plodding Flemish painter, who draws a shrimp with the most minute exactness, he had all the genius of one of the first masters. Never, I believe, were such talents and such drudgery united. But I admire Dryden most, who has succeeded by mere dint of genius, and in spite of a laziness and carelessness almost peculiar to himself. His faults are numberless, but so are his beauties. His faults are those of a great man, and his beauties are such (at least sometimes) as Pope, with all his touching and retouching, could never equal."—COWPER: Letter to Unwin, Jan. 5, 1782.

"He [Johnson] observed that in Dryden's poetry there were passages drawn from a profundity which Pope could never reach."—Boswell, by Croker, 203.

"The school of Dryden and Pope, which prevailed till a very late period of the last century, is neither the most poetical nor the most national part of our literary annals. These great poets sometimes indeed ventured into the regions of pure poetry; but their general character is, that 'not in fancy's maze they wandered long,' and that they rather approached the elegant correctness of our Continental neighbours, than supported the daring flight which in the former age had borne English poetry to a sublimer elevation than that of any other modern people of the West."—Sir J. Mackintosh: Works, ed. 1854, ii. 504–505.

"We criticised Pope's lines 'On an Unfortunate Lady.' He [Sir J. Mackintosh] would not allow that they were cold, which I thought they were, repeating 'By foreign hands,' &c., and adding, 'Surely these are not cold.' He was much moved in repeating them."—Life of Sir J. Mackintosh, ii., chap. vii.

"Shall I venture to own to you that in mental power I give him only the third place among the wits of his time? In talent, that is, in power formed and directed by habit to one sort of exertion, his place may be higher. He had a greater talent for brilliant and sententious verse than perhaps any of his contemporaries had for any other kind of literary excellence. I really think that his great merit is the same with that of a writer of maxims. His observations on life are both sensible and fine, but they are seldom his own; they have not the truth of immediate experience; and in his maxims, like that of his brethren, the truth is always in part sacrificed to the brilliancy; some part of the jewel is cut away in polishing. A talent very inferior to a man's general power of mind, especially when joined to mannerism, strikes me as a sort of knack. Estimated by the two great faculties of the human mind, his place must be where I have assigned it. Swift was as much above him in understanding, as Addison in imagination,—not to mention taste. Both Swift and Addison are more classical writers; that is, their writings approach more near to the models of beauty in their respective kinds."—Sir J. Mackintosh: Life, ii., chap. ii.

"Pope has incomparably more spirit and taste and animation than Addison."—Lord Jeffrey: Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 379.

"Where, then, according to the question proposed at the beginning of this Essay, shall we with justice be authorized to place our admired Pope? Not, assuredly, in the same rank with Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton; however justly we may applaud the Eloisa and Rape of the Lock. But, considering the correctness, elegance, and utility of his works, the weight of sentiment and the know[illegible]ge of man they contain, we may venture to assign him a p[illegible] next to Milton, and just above Dryden. Yet, to bring our m[illegible] steadily to make this decision, we must forget for a moment the divine Music Ode of Dryden, and may perhaps then be compelled to confess that, though Dryden be the greater genius, yet Pope is the better artist.

"The preference here given to Pope above other modern English poets, it must be remembered, is founded on the excellencies of his works in general, and taken all together; for there are parts and passages in other modern authors—in Young and in Thomson, for instance—equal to any of Pope; and he has written nothing in a strain so truly sublime as the Bard of Gray."—Joseph Warton: Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope.

"If Pope must yield to other poets in point of fertility of fancy, yet in point of propriety, closeness, and elegance of diction he can yield to none."—Joseph Warton.

"What rank should be assigned to Pope in a classification of our English poets, has been a subject of frequent inquiry. It is evident that by far the greater part of his original productions consists of ethic and satiric poetry; and by those who estimate mere moral sentiment, or the exposure, in splendid versification, of fashionable vice or folly, as the highest principle of the art, he must be considered as the first of bards. If, however, sublimity, imagination, and pathos be, as they assuredly are, the noblest efforts of the creative powers, and the most difficult of attainment, Pope will be found to have some superiors, and several rivals. With Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton he cannot, in these essential qualities, enter into competition; and when compared with Dryden, Young, and Thomson, the mind hesitates in the allotment of superiority."—Dr. Drake.

"In the enthusiasm, the fire, the force and copiousness of poetic genius, Dryden, though a much less correct writer, appears to have been superior to him. One can scarcely think that he was capable of epic or tragic poetry; but within a certain limited region he has been outdone by no poet. . . . The qualities for which he was chiefly distinguished are, judgment and wit, with a concise and happy expression and a melodious versification. Few poets ever had more wit, and, at the same time, more judgment to direct the proper employment of that wit."—Hugh Blair: Lects. on Rhetoric, Lect. XL.

Yet Pope did not think himself unequal to epic poetry:

"I should certainly have written an Epic Poem, if I had not been engaged in the translation of Homer."—Spence, by Singer.

"Dryden and Pope are the great masters of the artificial style of poetry in our language, as the poets of whom I have already treated, Chaucer, Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton, were of the natural; and though this artificial style is generally and very justly acknowledged to be inferior to the other, yet those who stand at the head of that class ought, perhaps, to rank higher than those who occupy an inferior place in a superior class."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the English Poets, Lect. IV. See, also, Appendix, iv.

"That Pope was neither so insensible to the beauties of nature, nor so indistinct in describing them, as to forget the character of a true poet, is what I mean to urge, without exaggerating his picturesqueness."—Campbell's Specimens of the British Poets.

Mr. Rogers tells us that Charles James Fox "liked Pope, but thought him much inferior to Dryden. Fitzpatrick was a great Papist, and would not hear of the Rape of the Lock as his best. Perhaps his Homer should be mentioned as his great work, after all."—Recollec., by S. Rogers, 1859, 48.

"There are no pictures of nature or of simple emotion in all his writings. He is the poet of town life and of high life and of literary life, and seems so much afraid of incurring ridicule by the display of natural feeling or unregulated fancy, that it is difficult not to imagine that he would have thought such ridicule very well directed."—Lord Jeffrey: Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 380.

"We shall not enter into the question whether Pope had most taste or genius. Perhaps he was destined by nature for bold invention; but in fact he has, in general, imitated with taste. The same thing may be said of Horace, Vida, and Boileau. Pope, like them, was a critic as well as a poet. It is a curious observation that no poet of the first rank has ever spoken of the mechanism of his art, while poets of inferior station have laboriously displayed its rules in verse."—Ugo Foscolo: Edin. Rev., Feb. 1818, 461.

"The most striking characteristics of his poetry are lucid arrangement of matter, closeness of argument, marvellous condensation of thought and expression, brilliance of fancy ever supplying the aptest illustrations, and language elaborately finished almost beyond example."—Rev. Alexander Dyce.

"In the judgment of England, in the eighteenth century, the reputation of Pope may be called the most dazzling in English literature. It was a nearer sun than Dryden, Milton, Shakspeare; as for Spenser and Chaucer, they were little better than fixed stars."—Prof. John Wilson: Blackw. Mag., lvii. 380.

"Pope, as the follower of Dryden in verse, excelled him as much in grace and harmony of numbers as he might be deemed to fall below him in raciness and pithy originality."—James Montgomery: View of Mod. Eng. Lit., No. 1.

"Pope, the prince of lyric poetry, unrivalled in satire, ethicks, and polished versification."—Smollett: Hist. of Eng., George I., Notes.

"This prince of lyric poetry."—Lord Campbell: Lives of the Chief Justices, ii., ch. xxx.

"Pope was an exquisite satirist; but it is not an exquisite satirist that is to show up such a city as London to scorn. . . . In his serious poetry sorrow is seen, we think, through many passages; and his mirth, which is rare, is still seldom without a tinge—a dash of melancholy. It was only when he gave vent to love or indignation that he was a great writer."—Prof. John Wilson: Works, v. 1856, 231–232.

"The fault of a great part of Pope is that there is nothing but reasoning, without either imagination or sentiment."—Sir S. E. Brydges: Remarks on Milton's Comus.

> "In Pope I cannot read a line
> But with a sigh I wish it mine,
> When he can in one couplet fix
> More sense than I can do in six."
> Swift: On Poetry: a Rhapsody.

"Pope's talent lay remarkably in what one may naturally enough term the condensation of thoughts. I think no English poet ever brought so much sense into the same number of lines with equal smoothness, ease, and poetical beauty. Let him who doubts of this peruse the Essay on Man with attention."—Shenstone: Essay on Men and Manners.

"He [Gray] approved an observation of Shenstone, that 'Pope had the art of condensing a thought.'"—Nicholls's Reminiscences of Gray, 37.

Mr. De Quincey, referring to Voltaire's acquaintance with Pope, remarks,

"Speaking of him after death to Frederick of Prussia, he prefers him to Horace and Boileau, asserting that, by comparison with them,

> 'Pope approfondit ce qu'ils ont effleuré.
> D'un esprit plus hardi, d'un pas plus assuré,
> Il porta le flambeau dans l'abîme de l'être;
> Et l'homme avec lui seul apprit à se connaître.
> L'art quelquefois frivole, et quelquefois divine,
> L'art des vers dans Pope utile au genre humain.'"
> Life of Pope, in Encyc. Brit.

Mr. De Quincey, on his own account, pronounces Pope "the most brilliant of all wits who have at any period applied themselves to the poetic treatment of human manners, to the selecting from the play of human character what is picturesque or the arresting what is fugitive."—Ibid.

"Not therefore for superior correctness," remarks Mr. De Quincey, on a later page,—"but for qualities the very same as belong to his most distinguished brethren, is Pope to be considered a great poet; for impassioned thinking, powerful description, pathetic reflection, brilliant narration. His characteristic difference is simply that he carried these powers into a different field, and moved chiefly amongst the social paths of men, and viewed their characters as operating through their manners."—Ubi supra.

"Pope, in his characters of men and women, tells us their several opinions and passions; but these opinions and passions should be uttered by themselves. There is a sympathy we feel with the eloquent relater of his own sorrows, which cannot be raised by the relation of a third person."—Sir S. E. Brydges: Remarks on Milton's Samson Agonistes.

"The most harmonious, correct, and popular of the English poets."—Roscoe.

See the Estimate of the Poetical Character and Writings of Pope prefixed to vol. ii. of Roscoe's ed. of Pope's Works. It may be questioned if Pope is as much read as formerly; but his reputation as a poet has certainly suffered no abatement, nor is it likely that he will ever be displaced from his exalted position; but few love him,—as they love Shakspeare, Dante, and Milton.

"That great poet, and little man."—LORD BROUGHAM: Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1856, i. 183.

"Besides that brilliant genius and immense fame for both of which we should respect him, men of letters should admire him as being the greatest literary artist that England has seen. . . . He polished, he refined, he thought; he took thoughts from other works to adorn and complete his own; borrowing an idea or a cadence from another poet as he would a figure or a simile from a flower or a river-stream, or any object which struck him in his walk or contemplation of nature."—Thackeray's English Humourists, ed. 1858, 232.

"We acknowledge in Pope the sprightliness of an elegant fancy, graceful dignity of sentiment, a wit unceasing yet never tiring, satire playful yet severe, an accurate taste, a sententiousness of expression neither weakened by affectation nor clouded by ambiguity, and a uniform polish of language never rivalled. . . . We acknowledge and admire all these splendid attributes of genius of Pope; but we still think him wanting in that power of awakening the most sublime and tender emotions so requisite to the perfection of poetry."—WM. H. PRESCOTT: N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1821: Byron's Letter on Pope.

See, also, Prescott's article on English Literature of the Nineteenth Century, in N. Amer. Rev., July, 1832, 167, and his Miscellanies, ed. 1855, 483, 602.

But we have just written the name of Byron; and who has ever equalled his lordship in his admiration of the Bard of Twickenham?

"He is the moral poet of all civilization!" exclaims his noble eulogist, "and, as such, let us hope that he will one day be the national poet of all mankind. He is the only poet that never shocks; the only poet whose faultlessness has been made his reproach. Cast your eye over his productions; consider their extent, and contemplate their variety,—pastoral, passion, mock-heroic, translation, satire, ethics,—all excellent, and often perfect. If his great charm be his melody, how comes it that foreigners adore him, even in their diluted translations?"—Letter to * * * * * * * * [John Murray] on the Rev. W. L. Bowles's Strictures on the Life and Writings of Pope, 1821.

Again:

"Neither time, nor distance, nor grief, nor age, can ever diminish my veneration for him, who is the great moral poet of all times, of all climes, of all feelings, and of all stages of existence. The delight of my boyhood, the study of my manhood, perhaps (if allowed to me to attain it) he may be the consolation of my age. His poetry is the Book of Life. Without canting, and yet without neglecting religion, he has assembled all that a good and great man can gather together of moral wisdom clothed in consummate beauty. . . . Such 'a poet of a thousand years' was Pope. A thousand years will roll away before such another can be hoped for in our literature. But it can want them; he himself is a literature."—Suppressed Defence of Gilchrist: Moore's Life of Byron, N. York, 1831, ii. 327-328. See, also, 102, 221, 253, 256, 257, 258, 259, 273, 278, 320, 321, 326, 329; Lady Blessington's Conversations with Lord Byron, Boston, 1859, 337.

"Of Pope himself he [Lord Byron] spoke with extravagant admiration. He did not venture directly to say that the little man of Twickenham was a greater poet than Shakspeare or Milton; but he hinted pretty clearly that he thought so."—LORD MACAULAY: Crit. and Histor. Essays, ed. 1854, i. 335.

12. POPE'S MERITS AS A COMMENTATOR ON SHAKSPEARE.

Whether Mr. Singer be correct or not in his surmise that "perhaps Pope did not relish Shakspeare more than he seems to have done Milton," (Spence's Anec., ed. 1820, 200, n.,) we shall not venture to decide; but certain it is that he did not (honourably) distinguish himself as a Shaksperian commentator. His heart was not in the business; it was no labour of love:

"The edition of Shakspeare (which he undertook merely because he thought nobody else would) took up near two years more in the drudgery of comparing impressions, rectifying the scenery, &c."—POPE: Note in Dunciad, 1736, 12mo, 224.

For this "drudgery" Pope received the sum of £217 12*s*. Tonson sold the principal part of the edition of 750 copies of Shakspeare's Works, thus edited, at six guineas for the six quarto volumes. But subsequently 140 copies were sold at sixteen shillings for the six volumes. It was attacked by Theobald in his Shakspeare Restored, or Specimens of Blunders Committed and Unamended in Pope's Edition of that Author, Lon., 1726, 4to, and still further exposed in Theobald's ed. of Shakspeare's Dramatic Works, with Notes, 1733, 7 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1740, 8 vols. 12mo. Pope and Warburton endeavoured to return Theobald's ridicule; but he was more than a match, in his own narrow field, for both of them. (See THEOBALD, LEWIS.)

"Mr. Pope discharged his duty so well, as to make his edition the best foundation for all future improvements."—WARBURTON: Preface to his ed. of Shakspeare.

"His edition of Shakspeare is probably the worst ever published. Of the conjectural emendations, Johnson's are very middling, Warburton's worse than middling, and Pope's worst of all. They are universally and woefully flat."—Blackw. Mag., x. 184.

An intelligent foreign critic remarks of Pope's edition,

"Pope asserts that he [Shakspeare] wrote both better and worse than any other man. All the scenes and passages which did not square with the littleness of his own taste, he wished to place to the account of interpolating players; and he was in the right road, had his opinion been taken, of giving us a miserable dole of a mangled Shakspeare."—A. W. SCHLEGEL: Lects. on Dramat. Art and Lit., Black's trans., 1846, 347.

Warton laments that Pope ever undertook the enterprise:

"A task which the course of his reading and studies did not qualify him to execute with the ability and skill which it deserved, and with which it has since been executed. . . . The Preface is written with taste, judgment, purity, and elegance.'

Than the Preface, Prof. Wilson says,

"Nothing can be better. Dryden gave us large and grand outlines; Pope's is closer criticism."—Blackw. Mag., lvii. 383.

Even De Quincey—one of the most brilliant of writers and unsafe of critics—whose constant liability to the furor biographicus and lues Boswellianæ incapacitates him for the judgment-seat—has to admit that "The opinion of all judges . . . has ever since pronounced this work the very worst edition in existence. For the edition," he proceeds to remark, "we have little to plead; but for the editor it is but just to make three apologies."—Encyc. Brit.

These "three apologies" the reader can consider at his leisure; and he must also allow due weight to what is urged in the editor's favour by his greatest biographer:

"Pope in his edition undoubtedly did many things wrong, and left many things undone; but let him not be defrauded of his due praise. He was the first that knew, at least the first that told, by what helps the text might be improved. If he inspected the early editions negligently, he taught others to be more accurate. In his Preface he expanded with great skill and elegance the character which had been given of Shakspeare by Dryden; and he drew the public attention upon his works, which, though often mentioned, had been little read."—JOHNSON: Life of Pope, 48.

"I have all his [Pope's] notes, that no fragment of so great a writer may be lost; his Preface, valuable alike for elegance of composition and justness of remark, and containing a general criticism on his author, so extensive that little can be added, and so exact that little can be disputed, every editor has an interest to suppress, but that every reader would demand its insertion."—JOHNSON: Pref. to Shakspeare. See, also, ROBERTS, JOHN.

13. POPE'S MERITS AS A LETTER-WRITER.

The history of the publication of Pope's letters has been sufficiently noticed on a preceding page. It was not to be supposed that a point so vulnerable,—the exposition of private letters,—even had the manner of promulgation been unquestionable, would be neglected by the satirist's fair but bitter enemy. Fifteen years after the publication of Pope's acknowledged quarto, (1737,) she writes to a friend,

"There cannot be a stronger proof of his [Pope's] being capable of any action for the sake of gain than publishing his literary correspondence, which lays open such a mixture of duiness and ingenuity that one would imagine it visible even to his most passionate admirers."—Lady M. W. Montagu to the Countess of Bute, June 23, 1752.

But, if his epistles confirmed one enemy, according to the convert's own assertion they transformed a more powerful foe into a friend:

"Till his Letters were published, I had as indifferent an opinion of his morals as they [Theobald and Company] pretended to have."—Warburton to Hurd, Jan. 12, 1757.

"If I could receive letters from you and Mr. Pope, as you had leisure, I would never come to town as long as I live."—Duchess of Marlborough to Lord Marchmont, March 15, 1742, (see ante.)

"They are all over-crowded with professions of integrity and disinterestedness, with trite reflections on contentment and retirement, a disdain of greatness and courts, a contempt of fame, and an affected strain of commonplace morality."—JOSEPH WARTON.

"Pope seems to have thought that unless a sentence was well turned, and every period pointed with some conceit, it was not worth the carriage. Accordingly, he is to me, except in a very few instances, the most disagreeable maker of epistles that I ever met with."—Cowper to Unwin, June 8, 1780.

"It is a mercy to have no character to maintain. Your predecessor, Mr. Pope, laboured his Letters as much as the 'Essay on Man;' and, as they were written to everybody, they do not look as if they had been written to anybody."—Horace Walpole to Rev. Wm. Mason, Mar. 13, 1777: Letters, ed. 1861, vi. 422.

"Gray said of his [Pope's] letters that they were not good letters, but better things."—N. Nicholls's Reminis. of Gray, 37.

"Of his social qualities, if an estimate be made from his Letters, an opinion too favourable cannot easily be formed; they exhibit a perpetual and unclouded effulgence of general benevolence and particular fondness. There is nothing but liberality, gratitude, constancy, and tenderness. . . . If the Letters of Pope are considered merely as compositions, they seem to be premeditated and artful. . . . Pope may be said to write always with his reputation in his head; Swift, perhaps, like a man who remembered that he was writing to Pope; but Arbuthnot, like one who lets his thoughts drop from his pen as they rise into his mind. . . . In the Letters both of Swift and Pope there appears such narrowness of mind as makes them insensible of any excellence that has not some affinity with their own, and confines their esteem and approbation to so small a number, that whoever should form his opinion of the age from their representation, would suppose them to have lived amidst ignorance and barbarity, unable to find among their contemporaries either virtue or intelligence, and persecuted by those that could not understand them."—JOHNSON: Life of Pope, 64, 103, 104, 107.

"In all his letters, as well as in those of Swift, there runs a strain of pride, as if the world talked of nothing but themselves."—GOLDSMITH: Life of Nash.

"The most distinguished collection of letters in the English language is that of Mr. Pope, Dean Swift, and their friends; partly published in Mr. Pope's works, and partly in those of Dean Swift. The collection is, on the whole, an entertaining and agreeable one, and contains much wit and refinement. . . . The censure of writing letters in too artificial a manner falls heaviest on Mr. Pope himself. There is visibly more study and less of nature and the heart in his letters than in those of his correspondents. He had formed himself on the manner of Voiture, and is too fond of writing like a wit. His letters to ladies are full of affectation."—HUGH BLAIR: Lects. on Rhetoric, &c., Lect. XXXVII.

"Pope, in addressing ladies, was nearly the ape of Voiture."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, iii. 138.

"A taint of affectation, more or less strong, runs through the whole of Pope's Letters: those to the ladies, particularly, are stuffed with miserable and frigid attempts to be gay and gallant."—GREEN: Diary of a Lover of Lit., 65.

"All his correspondents are made easy by flattery, laid on without conscience or remorse."—SINGER: Spence's Anec., 303, n.

Mr. Thackeray does not admire Pope's letters to the ladies, (Lady Montagu, &c.,) and would not advise the perusal of the first part of his correspondence, generally.

"But," he continues, "save that unlucky part of the Pope Correspondence, I do not know, in the range of our literature, volumes more delightful. You live in them in the finest company in the world. A little stately, perhaps; a little apprêté, and conscious that they are speaking to whole generations who are listening; but in the tone of their voices,—pitched, as no doubt they are, beyond the mere conversation key,—in the expression of their thoughts, their various views and natures, there is something generous and cheering and ennobling. You are in the society of men who have filled the greatest parts in the world's story; you are with St. John the statesman, Peterborough the conqueror, Swift the greatest wit of all times, Gay the kindliest laugher: it is a privilege to sit in that company."—English Humourists, ed. 1858, 196–204.

"His last letters are much superior to his early and very puerile productions; but his best are, in matter and manner, much inferior to those of Swift."—SIR J. MACKINTOSH: Life, ii., chap. ii.

"The best of those later letters between Pope and Swift, &c. are not in themselves at all superior to the letters of sensible and accomplished women, such as leave every town in the island by every post. Their chief interest is a derivative one: we are pleased with any letter, good or bad, which relates to men of such eminent talent; and sometimes the subjects discussed have a separate interest for themselves. . . . Pope especially ought not to have his ethereal works loaded by the mass of trivial prose which is usually attached to them."—DE QUINCEY: Life of Pope, in Encyc. Brit.

"No one can read them without feeling they were written for more eyes than those of his correspondents. There is a laboured smartness, a constant exhibition of fine sentiment, which is strained and unnatural. His repeated deprecation of motives of aggrandizement argues 'a thinking too precisely' on the very subject; and no man whose chief ambition was to gain a few friends would so habitually proclaim it. These tender and delicate aspirations live in the secret places of the heart. . . . True sentiment is modest."—H. T. TUCKERMAN: Thoughts on the Poets, 3d ed., 1846, 76.

"Pope's letters very bad: I think him a foolish fellow, upon the whole, myself; but he has certainly feeling; and I like him best when not a satirist."—CHARLES JAMES FOX: Recollec., by S. Rogers, 1859, 37.

"Pope's letters and prose writings neither take away from, nor add to, his poetical reputation. There is occasionally a littleness of manner, and an unnecessary degree of caution. He appears anxious to say a good thing in every word as well as every sentence. They, however, give a very favourable idea of his moral character in all respects; and his letters to Atterbury in disgrace and exile do equal honour to both."—HAZLITT: Lects. on the English Poets, Lect. IV. See, also, eulogistic comments on Pope's letters by Leigh Hunt, in his Men, Women, and Books, vol. ii.; Pope, in some Lights in which he is not usually regarded,—Fraser's Mag., 1855; same, in Living Age, xliv. 183.

But what have we been doing but giving, little by little, a list of POPIANA, as we added the names of our authorities to the quotations which occupy the chief part of the preceding pages? Both Goldsmith and Scott meditated lives of Pope and editions of his works. Would that they had carried out their good resolutions! The following curious anecdote we think well worthy of quotation:

"By one of those acts which neither science nor curiosity can excuse, the skull of Pope is now in the private collection of a phrenologist. The manner in which it was obtained is said to have been this. On some occasion of alteration in the church, or burial of some one in the same spot, the coffin of Pope was disinterred, and opened to see the state of the remains; by a bribe to the sexton of the time, possession of the skull was obtained for the night, and another skull returned instead of it. I have heard that fifty pounds were paid to manage and carry through this transaction. Be that as it may, the skull of Pope figures in a private museum."—Howitt's Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets: Pope.

We may appropriately conclude our life of this great poet by the citation of some lines on his character as a man and an author, by one of his distinguished associates:

"If we may judge of him by his works, his chief aim was to be esteemed a man of virtue. His letters are written in that style; his last volumes are all of the moral kind; he has avoided trifles, and consequently has escaped a rock which has proved very injurious to Dr. Swift's reputation. He has given his imagination full scope, and yet has preserved a perpetual guard upon his conduct. The constitution of his body and mind might really incline him to the habits of caution and reserve. The treatment which he met with afterwards, from an innumerable tribe of adversaries, confirmed this habit, and made him slower than the Dean in pronouncing his judgment upon persons and things. His prose writings are little less harmonious than his verse; and his voice, in common conversation, was so naturally musical, that I remember honest Tom Southern used to call him the little nightingale. His manners were delicate, easy, and engaging, and he treated his friends with a politeness that charmed, and a generosity that was much to his honour. Every guest was made happy within his doors, pleasure dwelt under his roof, and elegance presided at his table."—Lord Orrery.

Popham, Sir John, 1531–1607, a native of Huntworth, Somersetshire, educated at Baliol College, entered the Middle Temple, and for some years led a dissipated life, but, applying himself to his profession, became Serjeant-at-Law about 1570; Solicitor-General, 1579; Attorney-General, 1581; Chief Justice King's Bench, 1592.

He was at one time Speaker of the House of Commons. Reports and Cases from the 34th to 39th of Queen Elizabeth, [1592–1627,] &c., Lon., 1656, fol.; 2d ed., 1682, fol. Popham's Cases, properly so called, occupy the first 123 pages. His portion—how much is really his can hardly be settled—was written in French. The book is of no authority.

"They are wretchedly ill done, and they are not considered of authority. We should have been much better pleased if he had given us an account of his exploits when he was chief of a band of freebooters."—LORD CAMPBELL: Chief Justices, i., chap. vi.

Popkin, John Snelling, D.D., 1771–1852, a native of Boston, graduated at Harvard College, 1792, and Greek tutor in that institution, 1795–98; licensed to preach by the Boston Association, 1798, and subsequently supplied the pulpit at Londonderry, N.H., and at Wenham, Mass.; pastor of the Frederick Street Church, Boston, 1799–1802, and of the First Parish in Newbury, Mass., 1804–15; D.D., Harvard Univ., 1815; Prof. of Greek, Harvard Univ., 1815–26, and Eliot Prof. of Greek Literature in same institution, 1826–33. From 1833 he lived in retirement at Cambridge. He left the Unitarian Church for the "Orthodox Congregational Society," and subsequently became an Episcopalian. Two Discourses, 1816, 8vo. He pub. at Newburyport eight separate Sermons, 1803, '05, '06, '13, '14, '15; Two Serms. delivered on the Lord's Day preceding a removal to Harvard University, 1816, 8vo; A Grammar of the Greek Language, Camb., 1828, 8vo; Three Lectures on Liberal Education, 1836; republished in 1852, (see post.) He also edited Editio quarta Americana of Dalzel's Collectanea Græca Majora, Cantab., 1824, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Among the most profound scholars of the country."—JOHN PICKERING: Remarks on Greek Grammar, 1826, 8vo.

"Professor Popkin, than whom America has never produced a scholar more profound in the department of Grecian learning, has here given us a better edition of this book, which has often made its appearance at Edinburgh and London, than any that preceded it."—GEORGE BANCROFT: N. Amer. Rev., July, 1826, 142–150.

Dr. Popkin's learned successor in the Eliot Greek Professorship, Cornelius C. Felton —a zealous student, equally at home in the languages of Demosthenes, of Cicero, and of Chatham,—pub. in 1852 A Memorial of Rev. John Snelling Popkin, D.D., &c., Cambridge, 16mo, pp. lxxxviii. and 392. The volume contains the three Lectures on Liberal Education, (supra,) some selections from lectures on Greek literature, and a few passages from sermons published and unpublished. It was reviewed by George S. Hillard in the North American Review for October, 1852, 473–488.

"We take leave of Professor Felton with an acknowledgment, in which we are sure that all the old pupils of Dr. Popkin will share, for his labors of love in editing this volume. . . . Nothing can be more genial, graceful, and appropriate than the biography which Professor Felton has prefixed to this volume. It tells us all that we want to know, and no more."—474, 488, ubi supra.

An interesting letter of reminiscences of Dr. Popkin, by Professor Felton, will be found in Sprague's Annals, Trin. Congreg., ii., 1857, 436–438. We extract an anecdote:

"Being once asked by an anxious lady of his parish if he was a Hopkinsian,—a sectarian designation formerly much in vogue in the religious world,—he replied, 'Madam, I am a Popkinsian.'"

"The vigour of his mind and the range of his acquirements," remarks Dr. Felton, "are sufficiently exhibited in his published works. His sermons are models of excellence, both in matter and manner."—SPRAGUE: ubi sup., 437.

Porson, Richard, 1759–1808, a native of East Ruston, Norfolk, where his father was parish clerk, received his early education from Mr. Summers, of Happesburgh, and Mr. Charles Hewitt, Vicar of East Ruston and Bacton, and was, by the kind offices of Mr. Norris, of Witton, placed at Eton on the foundation in 1774. Mr. Norris died whilst his protégé was at Eton, but his place as a benefactor to the youth was supplied by Sir George Baker, M.D., whose attainments as a classical scholar have been commemorated on a preceding page (103) of this Dictionary. In 1777 Porson was admitted under-graduate of Trinity College; in 1781 was elected to a University Scholarship on Lord Craven's foundation; and on his taking his degree of B.A., in 1782, was third senior optime and senior medallist; in October, 1782, became Fellow of his college; in 1785 took the degree of M.A.; in 1790 was made Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge, (salary £40 per annum;) was deterred from taking orders by scruples respecting subscription to the Thirty-Nine Articles, and therefore, according to rule, vacated his fellowship in 1791; in November, 1795, married Mrs. Lunan, (she survived the marriage about eighteen months,) sister of Mr. Perry of the Morning Chronicle, (supra;) in 1806 was appointed Head Librarian of the London Institution, (salary £200 per annum,) established in that year, and died in his rooms in the Old Jewry, September 25, 1808.

"While he [Pitt] was in power, the greatest philologist of his age, his own contemporary at Cambridge, was reduced to earn a livelihood by the lowest literary drudgery, and to spend in writing squibs for the Morning Chronicle, years to which we might have owed an all-but perfect text of the whole tragic and comic drama of Athens."—LORD MACAULAY: Life of William Pitt, in Encyc. Brit., 8th ed., xvii., 1859.

That his constitution, which had been much impaired by spasmodic asthma, was injured by intemperance, is not to be denied; that he was a habitual drunkard, as often asserted, has been denied on good authority; and the charge is fully disproved by the extent and the character of his learned labours. In 1792, about £2000 was voted for his benefit in the funds; and after his death the interest of £400 of this money was devoted to an annual prize still known as the Porson Prize. A vol. entitled the Porson Prize Exercises, 1817–50, was pub. at Cambridge in 1850, p. 8vo; new ed., 1817–56, 1857, p. 8vo. This collection must not be neglected by the classical student, who must also peruse Dr. Thomas Young's memoir of Porson, (to which we have been largely indebted in this article,) in Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., (repub., in part, in 8th ed.; and see, also, Young's Works, 1855, vol. iii.,) and the authorities referred to at conclusion of this sketch.

CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF PORSON'S PUBLICATIONS.

I. Articles in Dr. Maty's Review, viz.: 1. June, 1783, Strutz's Æschylus. Repub. in Porson's Tracts, &c., ed. by Kidd, 1815, 8vo.

II. July, 1783, Brunck's Aristophanes. Written in a day. Repub., Tracts, iii.; Mus. Crit., ii. 113. In Latin, by Schäfer, Class. Jour., v. 136.

III. April, 1784, Weston's Hermesianax. Repub., Tracts, iv.

IV. August, 1784, Huntingford's Apology for his Menostrophics. Repub., Tracts, v.

V. April, 1785, Account of the Learned Pig. Repub., Tracts, vi.

VI. April, 1786, Note, with Letters of Le Clerc and Bentley. Repub., Tracts, vii.

2. Notes (addressed Lectori si quis erit) to Xenophon's Anabasis, Camb., 1786, 4to and 8vo. And, adjecit etiam Notas breves, W. Whiter, Lon., 1810, 8vo.

3. In Gent. Mag., Aug., Sept., and Oct., 1787, Three Panegyrical Epistles to Sir J. Hawkins, signed SUNDRY WHEREOF. Repub., Tracts, ix.

4. Notes (written in 1787) on Toupii Emendationes in Suidam, Oxf., 1790, 8vo.

5. In Gent. Mag., Oct. and Dec. 1788, Feb., April, May, June, Aug. 1789, Feb. 1790, Letters (xii.) on the Three Witnesses. The last was repub. in Tracts, xix.; most of the others in the collection of Letters to Mr. Archdeacon Travis, in answer to his Defence of the Three Heavenly Witnesses, Lon., 1790, 8vo; 1800, 8vo. To these famous Letters, intended to disprove the authenticity of 1 John v. 7, we have referred on preceding pages, (see BURGESS, THOMAS, D.D.; ENGLISH, GEORGE B.; GIBBON, EDWARD, 663; NEWTON, SIR ISAAC, No. 9, 1420; PENN, GRANVILLE, No. 10;) but a few additional quotations on a subject of such interest will readily be excused. Porson's habitual modesty—for modesty was one of his most strongly marked characteristics—did not prevent the free exposition of his own opinion as to the results of the controversy.

"[Porson] spoke with much complacency of his Letters to Travis, by which he had crushed his opponent and set the question at rest."—[Green's] Diary of a Lover of Lit., Gent. Mag., Dec. 1836, 575.

But it has seldom happened to an author to be so well supported in his natural partiality for his own productions:

"Inimitable and invincible. . . . Travis was a superficial and arrogant declaimer, and his letters to Gibbon brought down upon him the just and heavy displeasure of an assailant equally irresistible from his wit, his reasoning, and his erudition—I mean the immortal Richard Porson."—DR. PARR.

"I consider Mr. Porson's answer to Archdeacon Travis as the most acute and accurate piece of criticism which has appeared since the days of Bentley. His strictures are founded in argument, enriched with learning, and enlivened with wit; and his adversary neither deserves nor finds any quarter at his hands. . . . The evidence of the three heavenly witnesses would now be rejected in any court of justice. . . . The more learned ecclesiastics will indeed have the secret satisfaction of reprobating in the closet what they read in the church."—GIBBON: Miscell. Works, ed. 1837, 101. See, also, 112.

"Porson's Letters to Archdeacon Travis are conspicuous for their erudition, acuteness, accuracy, virulence, bitterness, and invective."—MATHIAS: Pursuits of Lit., 16th ed., 1812, fol. 135, n. 53. See, also, 100, n., 330, n.

"Displaying uncommon soberness of judgment, keenness of perspicacity, and vigour of argumentation."—GREEN: Diary of a Lover of Lit., 1810, 4to, 213.

"Even the prejudiced reader must now be silenced, at least, by the learned and ingenious Letters of Mr. Porson to Archdeacon Travis."—EDWARD EVANSON.

"They discover the profound learning, prodigious acuteness, and elegant wit for which Porson was distinguished above all his contemporaries. . . . The spirit of the letters is unchristian; but they are admirable specimens of learning and acute argumentation."—Orme's Bibl. Bib., 360.

See, also, 439, and Orme's Memoir of the Controversy respecting the Heavenly Witnesses, 1 John v. 7, (referred to under ORME, WILLIAM, No. 9, supra;) Horne's Bib. Bibl., 182–85.

The last published notice of the Letters to Travis occurs in the Lectures and Essays on University Subjects issued within the last few weeks (1859) by a learned champion of the Roman Catholic Communion, the Rev. John Henry Newman, D.D., (see p. 1413, supra:)

"Porson is no edifying companion for young men of eighteen, nor are his letters on the text of the Three Heavenly Witnesses to be recommended; but that does not hinder his being admitted into Catholic schools, while he is confined within the limits of his Preface to the Hecuba."

But surely the "limits" are rather restricted: circumspice!

"These Letters are generally considered, by critics of all parties, as finally decisive of a question which had often been agitated before, but never so learnedly argued nor so satisfactorily discussed in all its bearings."—THOMAS YOUNG, M.D.: Memoir of Porson, Encyc. Brit.

See, also, Blackw. Mag., xxviii. 439, (by T. De Quincey;) Sir D. Brewster's Life of Sir I. Newton, ed. 1855, ii. 334. It appears by a late publication (Recollec. by S. Rogers, 1859, 116) that Porson wished to suppress these letters.

6. Articles in the Monthly Review, viz.: I., Jan., 1789, Robertson's Essay on the Parian Chronicle. In defence of the authenticity of that monument. Repub. in Tracts, xiii. II., July, 1793, Edwards's edit. of the work attributed to Plutarch on Education. Repub., Tracts, xxi. III., Jan. 1794, Payne Knight's Greek Alphabet. Repub., Tracts, xxiii. IV., Dec. 1800, Pybus's Sovereign. A piece displaying much humour.

7. Remarks on an Essay on the Transfiguration. Repub., Tracts, xv. Supposed to be Porson's, but never expressly acknowledged by him.

8. Notes to Virgilii Opera, Heyne, Lon., 1793, 4 vols. r. 8vo. To this republication of the Leipsic ed. of 1788 he added but a few short Notes. Porson agreed to correct the press; but he complained that his corrections were disregarded; and several hundred errors attest to a failing in some quarter.

9. Corrections to the Greek text of Æschylus, Pauw's ed., Hag. Com., 1745, for the Glasgow editions, the folio of 1795, and the two vols. 8vo, printed in 1794, but only pub. at London in 1806. The folio is said to have appeared surreptitiously. (See Mathias's Pursuits of Lit., ed. 1812, 144.) Of both folio and octavo edits. there are copies on large paper. Porson corrected more than 200 errors, and indicates other corrupt passages. See Lon Mon. Rev., 1796, i. 120–36.

10. In the Morning Chronicle, the Nursery Song in Greek Iambics, 13th April, 1796, called A Fragment of Sophocles, (in ridicule of Ireland's "discoveries,") and other pieces.

11. Imitations of Horace, in Spirit of the Public Journals, 1797, and in Class. Jour., iv. 97.

12. The first four plays of Euripides, viz.: I. Hecuba, Lon., 1797, 8vo; Cantab., 1802, 8vo. With Supp. and Addit Notes, (which were also pub. separately,) Lon

1808, 8vo. New ed., by James Scholefield, Cantab., 1826, 8vo. See WAKEFIELD, GILBERT, No. 19. See strictures on ed. of 1797, in Monthly Review, 1799, i. 79, 192, 428, and ii. 311, 426, by an eminent Grecian, (see Edin. Rev., Nov. 1811, 65,) and a review of ed. of 1808, in Edin. Rev., Nov. 1811, 64, 95, by Peter Elmsley. Hermann's De Metris, Lips., 1796, and his ed. of the Hecuba, 1800, must be read with Porson's Preface. With the English prose, by T. W. C. Edwards, 1822, 8vo; with English Notes, by Rev. J. R. Major, 1826, 8vo. Commended by Lit. Chron., Jan. 1827. With reference to Porson's Hecuba, see De Quincey's Philos. Writers, Bost., 1854, 81–82; Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxix. 312, (by Rev. J. J. Blunt.) II. Orestes, Lon., 1798, 1811, 1818, 8vo. With the English prose, by T. W. C. Edwards, 1824, 8vo. III. Phœnissæ, Lon., 1799, 1811, 8vo. With the English Prose, by T. W. C. Edwards, 1823, 8vo. IV. Medea, Cantab., 1801, 8vo; Lon., 1812, '17, 8vo. With the English prose, by T. W. C. Edwards, 1821, 8vo. I., II., III., IV. were pub. in 1 vol., 1802, 8vo; again, 1822, 8vo. Porson's enthusiasm for Euripides is proverbial:

"When asked why he had written so little, Porson replied, 'I doubt if I could produce any original work which would command the attention of posterity. I can be known only by my notes; and I am quite satisfied if, three hundred years hence, it shall be said that "One Porson lived towards the close of the eighteenth century, who did a good deal for the text of Euripides."'"—Porsoniana: Rogers's Table-Talk.

13. Collation of the Harleian MS. of the Odyssey (with some short Notes, repub. in Class. Jour., ix.) for the superb ed. of Homer, Oxon., 1800, 4 vols. sm. 4to. Impensis D.D. Buckingham et Grenville excusa, Curis Th. Grenville, R. Porson, Randolph, Cleaver et Rogers. Ugo Foscolo says that the editors had done much to depreciate the merits of Wolff, nevertheless they had adopted all his readings. 25 copies were printed on large paper, with three engravings not in the other copies. Of these 25, 7 have been sold at different times for £552 10*s.*,—about £80 each on an average.

14. British Critic, May, 1801, Review of Wakefield's Lucretius; appears to be principally by Porson.

"When Porson first met Perry after the fire in the house of the latter at Merton, he immediately inquired 'if any lives had been lost?' Perry replied, 'No.' 'Well,' said Porson, 'then I shall not complain, though I have lost the labours of my life.' His transcript of the Cambridge Photius, which was burnt in that fire, he afterwards replaced by patiently making a second transcript; but his numerous notes on Aristophanes, which had also been consumed, were irrecoverably gone."—Porsoniana: Rogers's Table-Talk.

Aristophanes, we need scarcely remind the reader, was one of Porson's choicest books. See Gibbon's Decline and Fall, ed. 1837, 1010; Mathias's Pursuits of Lit., ed. 1812, 144, n.

To Porson were long attributed Eloisa en Dishabille, 1794, 4to, 1801, imp. 8vo, (since claimed for John Matthews: see Moore's Life of Byron, vol. i.,) and The Devil's Walk, really the joint production of Coleridge and Southey. (See Blackw. Mag., xix. 136, and—by De Quincey—xxviii. 671; Notes and Queries, 1866, i. 197.)

Mr. De Quincey rates Porson's powers of humour very low:

"Porson's jeux-d'esprit in the newspapers of his day were all childish and dull beyond description."—Blackw. Mag., xxviii. 671.

He also finds great fault with Porson's Latinity:

"In fact, he wrote Latin of any kind—such Latin even as was framed on his own poor ideal—with singular want of freedom and facility."—Blackw. Mag., xxix. 777.

In this respect he, of course, places him below Reiske, Wolff, Sir Wm. Jones, Bishop Lowth, Taylor, (ed. of Demosthenes,) and Parr. These strictures on Porson occur in De Quincey's articles on Bentley and Parr, and were repub. in his Essays on Philosophical Writers, &c., Bost., 1854, 5, 81, 111, 237.

It must be candidly admitted that at Eton Porson was not the first Grecian:

"When Goodall, . . . Head-Master, . . . was examined in 1818 before the Education Committee of the House of Commons respecting the alleged passing over of Porson in giving promotion to King's College, he at once declared that the celebrated Grecian was not by any means at the head of the Etonians of his day; and on being asked by me (as chairman) to name his superior, he at once said Lord Wellesley."—LORD BROUGHAM: States. of the Time of George III., ed. 1856, ii. 208–209.

How eminent he became in later life by his intense application, aided by a prodigious memory, we all know. No man ever spoke more modestly of his own merits than did Porson:

"He insisted that all men are born with abilities nearly equal. 'Any one,' he would say, 'might become quite as good a critic as I am, if he would only take the trouble to make himself so. I have made myself what I am by intense labour: sometimes, in order to impress a thing upon my memory, I have read it a dozen times, and transcribed it six.'"—Porsoniana: Rogers's Table-Talk.

"Porson was conscious of his own powers; and, though frank and good-humoured even to a fault with the unlearned, he was unbending among those who assumed the title of scholars. It has been observed that he neither would give nor take praise; and when he was told that a person named had called him a giant in literature, he remarked that a man had no right to tell the height of that which he could not measure."—Creasey's Memoirs of Eminent Etonians: Richard Porson, 1850, 466–471.

"Nothing came amiss to his memory," says Mr. Weston. "He would set a child right in his two-penny fable-book, repeat the whole moral tale of the Dean of Badajoz, a page of Athenæus on cups, or of Eustathius on Homer, even though he did every thing to impair his mental faculties."

See two wonderful instances of his memory recorded in Keddie's Cyc. of Lit. and Sci. Anecdotes, 1854, 126, 285. See, also, 22, 127, 265, 285, 286.

We quote some other opinions respecting Porson:

"Mr. Porson is a giant in literature, a prodigy in intellect, a critic whose mighty achievements leave imitation panting at a distance behind him, and whose stupendous powers strike down all the restless and aspiring suggestions of rivalry into silent admiration and passive awe."—DR. PARR: Reply to Combe.

But why put "Dr. Parr" after such bombast? Who does not recognize the "Brummagem Doctor"?

"Our first luminary in Greek learning, Mr. Porson."—DR. PARR: Lon. Gent. Mag., May, 1825, 387.

"I have been furnished with many opportunities of observing Porson, by a near inspection. He has been at my house several times, and once for an entire summer's day. Our intercourse would have been frequent but for three reasons: 1. His extreme irregularity and inattention to times and seasons, which did not at all comport with the methodical arrangements of my time and family; 2. His gross addiction to that lowest and least excusable of all sensualities, immoderate drinking; and, 3. The uninteresting insipidity of his society; as it is impossible to engage his mind on any topic of mutual inquiry, to procure his opinion on any author or on any passage of an author, or to elicit any conversation of any kind to compensate for the time and attendance of his company. And as for Homer, Virgil, and Horace, I never could hear of the least critical effort on them in his life. He is, in general, devoid of all human affections; but such as he has, are of a misanthropic quality; nor do I think that any man exists for whom his propensities rise to the lowest pitch of affection and esteem. He much resembles Proteus in Lycophron:

ὡ γελως απεχθεται,

though, I believe, he has satirical verses in his treasury for Dr. Bellenden, as he calls him, (PARR,) and all his most intimate associates. But in his knowledge of the Greek Tragedies and Aristophanes, in his judgment of MSS., and in all that relates to the metrical proprieties of dramatic and lyric versification, with whatever is connected with this species of reading, none of his contemporaries must pretend to equal him. His grammatical knowledge also, and his acquaintance with the antient Lexicographers and Etymologists, is most accurate and profound; and his intimacy with Shakspeare, B. Jonson, and other dramatic writers, is probably unequalled. He is, in short, a most extraordinary person in every view, but unamiable; and has been debarred of a comprehensive intercourse with Greek and Roman authors by his excesses, which have made those acquirements impossible to him, from the want of that time which must necessarily be expended in laborious reading, and for which no genius can be made a substitute. No man has ever paid a more voluntary and respectful homage to his talents, at all times, both publickly and privately, in writings and conversation, than myself; and I will be content to forfeit the esteem and affection of all mankind whenever the least particle of envy and malignity is found to mingle itself with my opinions."—GILBERT WAKEFIELD: Correspondence of Wakefield and Charles James Fox, Lon., 1813, pp. 99–101.

"In him criticism lost the most able, most expert, most accomplished support of her sceptre; learning, one of its greatest ornaments. His knowledge was far more extensive than was generally understood, or imagined, or believed. There are very few languages with which he had not some acquaintance. His discernment and acuteness in correcting what was corrupt, and explaining what was difficult and perplexed, were almost intuitive; and, in addition to all this, his taste was elegant and correct."—BELOE: Sexagenarian.

But every classical scholar asks, How does he compare with Bentley? On this theme something has already been cited, (see BENTLEY, RICHARD, D.D., p. 172, supra;) and the inquirer must examine the authorities to which we shall presently refer him. A few lines more, however, we may quote; and the first shall be from a memoir of Porson, by an acquaintance of his, published in the English Cyclopædia, Biography, iv., 1857, 939–942.

"Richard Porson was one of the profoundest Greek scholars and the greatest verbal critic that any age or country has produced. He possessed every quality which is necessary to the formation of a scholar,—a stupendous memory, unwearied application, great acuteness, strong sound sense, and a lively perception both of the beautiful and the ludicrous. Besides these qualifications, he enjoyed the rare faculty of conjecturing from the imperfect data of corrupt readings the very words of the author whose text he sought to restore; in this last particular we know of no one, with the single exception of Bentley, who can be named in comparison with him, and in some points we should not hesitate to place Porson before that great Aristarchus of criticism. . . . It is a great mistake to suppose that Porson's reading was confined to the Greek poets; we doubt if there were any classical author whom he had not read, and we are confident that he was familiar with the whole mass of Greek literature. We have looked through the editions of Greek books that belonged to him, which are now in the hands of different individuals or in public libraries, and there is not one which does not bear some traces of his careful and critical perusal. He was, besides, an excellent French scholar, and was thoroughly acquainted with the French literature of the middle ages. His knowledge of English literature was immense; and so extraordinary was his memory that he could repeat whole pages, not only of poetry, but of prose, in the most accurate and beautiful manner. . . . The greatest complaint that can be made against Porson is that with such vast capabilities he did so little. A very large sum was offered him for an edition of Aristophanes, but he would not undertake the work, which, in Dr. Raine's opinion, would not have occupied more than six months. The money was no temptation to him, and he was over-scrupulous in his notions of the duties of an editor, never fully satisfying himself, and conceiving that something was still wrong where no one but himself could discover any deficiency."

A learned friend, to whom, alas! we can no more appeal on questions of classical scholarship, favoured us with the following:

"I remain of the opinions, on Bentley's character for Greek scholarship, which I expressed many years ago, and to which you have referred in your Dictionary, [BENTLEY, RICHARD, D.D., p. 172, supra.] Porson I regard as standing next to him on the list of English Hellenists; and I concur in the main with the comparative judgment expressed of them by the Quarterly Reviewer whom you cite in the article on Bentley. But, if Bentley's time was partly wasted in paltry squabbles with his fellows, much of Porson's was lost in a less creditable way. In natural capacity he might have been Bentley's equal; but the latter had been a more laborious student, and had surveyed a wider field of criticism. Porson had the advantage of much ampler materials and numerous able collaborators. In England Bentley stood alone. So deplorably low was the standard of philology at that time, that the wits of the day assigned the palm to Boyle, in the famous controversy between him and Bentley. In Porson's time, the idea of Boyle as an antagonist to Bentley would have been universally scouted. Porson, I think, deserves all the credit which the Quarterly Reviewer gives him for accuracy; but he dwells very much on verbal criticism, and has left but little to attest his sk l,—which is, however, as I have already said, in my opinion second only to that of Bentley among English scholars. I ought, however, to express these opinions with diffidence; for my classical studies, though not wholly abandoned, have been much interrupted for many years."—Edward Everett to S. Austin Allibone, Oct. 20, 1859.

Dr. Thomas Young, who knew Porson for the last twenty years of his life, in his memoir of his friend, in the Encyc. Brit., does not hesitate to pronounce him

"The greatest of the verbal critics and classical scholars of modern times."

Again:

"It may safely be conceded to common fame and to partial friendship that he was one of the greatest men, and the very greatest critic, of his own or of any other age. . . . It has indeed been asserted, and perhaps with truth, (Classical Journal, xxi.,) that 'with things Porson appears to have possessed but a very inconsiderable acquaintance; and not a trace is to be found amidst his writings of that combination of universal encyclopædiacal knowledge with language-learning which is so abundantly found in the Dissertation on Phalaris, and the countless pages of Scaliger, Salmasius, and Casaubon.' Certainly, however, neither Salmasius nor Casaubon, with all their learning, much less Scaliger, with all his industry and parade, not even Bentley himself, with all his talent and acuteness, was at all comparable to Porson in his own department,—that is, as a sound, accurate, and refined Greek critic."

This is high praise; but here is something worth the whole of it:

"There is one quality of the mind in which it may be confidently maintained that Mr. Porson had no superior—I mean, the most pure and inflexible love of truth. Under the influence of this principle, he was cautious and patient and persevering in his researches, and scrupulously accurate in stating facts as he found them. All who were intimate with him bear witness to this noble part of his character, and his works confirm the testimony of his friends."—REV. THOMAS TURTON, in his Vindication of the Literary Character of the Late Professor Porson, &c., by Crito Cantabrigiensis, 1827, 8vo.

The handwriting of Porson was very beautiful; and Greek type was cut at Cambridge in imitation of the letters of his Greek notes. This is the well-known "Porsonian type," which has been used in England and in this country for the production of some exquisitely-printed Greek books. We have had engraved for this article a fac-simile of some of his corrections on one of the fly-leaves of a copy of the first edition of his Medea, formerly in the library of the Duke of Sussex, now (1869) in the possession of our esteemed friend Charles Short, LL.D., Professor of Latin in Columbia College, New York, —one of the ripest classical scholars of the present day.

Porter, Miss Jane, 1776–1850, a native of Durham, was the elder sister of Anna Maria Porter, (supra,) which see for notices of the family and references to authorities. In 1842 she visited St. Petersburg, and with her brother, Sir Robert Ker Porter, was on the point of returning home to England, when her departure was delayed by Sir R. K. Porter's sudden decease.

For some years before her death, Miss Porter resided with her brother, William Ogilvie Porter, M.D., of Bristol. She published: 1. Thaddeus of Warsaw; a Novel, Lon., 1803, 4 vols. 12mo; 9th ed., 1810, 4 vols. 12mo, and many eds. since; illust. ed., 1840, 8vo; last British edits., Lon., 1860, 12mo, 1868, cr. 8vo. Trans. into several foreign languages. Commended by Crit. Rev., Imper. Rev., Month. Rev., Anti-Jac. As an evidence of his appreciation of this work, Kosciusko sent Miss Porter a complimentary letter, and a relation of his presented her with a gold ring containing a portrait of the great general. The authoress was also elected a lady chanoi-ness of the Teutonic Order of St. Joachim, in the habit of which she appears in some of her portraits. 2. Aphorisms of Sir Philip Sidney; with Remarks, 1807, (some 1808,) 2 vols. 12mo. Commended by Oxford Rev. 3. The Scottish Chiefs; a Romance, 1810, 5 vols. 12mo; many eds.; illust. ed., 1840, 2 vols. 12mo; last British edits., Halifax, 1862, 12mo; 1866, 12mo. Sir Walter Scott admitted (conversation with George IV. in the library of Carlton Palace) that this work suggested his Waverley Novels.

"Wallace, in 'The Scottish Chiefs,'—which, through a rich variety of interesting imaginary adventures, conducts a character of most perfect virtue and heroism to an affecting and tragical end,—is a romance deservedly popular."—JOANNA BAILLIE.

"She has, however, added attributes which neither pertained to the times nor to the hero. . . . She has drawn him with a hand much too soft and gentle."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

4. The Pastor's Fireside; a Novel, 1815, 3 vols. 12mo; many eds.; illust. ed., 1840, 8vo; last British ed., 1857, 12mo. See MOORE, GEORGE, No. 3. 5. Duke Christian of Luneburgh; or, Traditions from the Hartz, 1824, 3 vols. 12mo. Written in consequence of "his Majesty's [George IV.] gracious request that Miss Porter's next subject should be the Life of his great and virtuous progenitor, Duke Christian of Luneburgh."

The original documents were furnished by the king, (who declared that the work "had been completed to his fullest wishes,") and the Duke of Clarence (afterwards William IV.) took a lively interest in the progress of the narrative.

6. Houtercombe; in Tales round a Winter's Hearth, 1826, 2 vols. 8vo: see PORTER, MISS ANNA MARIA, No. 15. 7. The Field of Forty Footsteps, 1828, 2 vols. 12mo. This story, founded on a tradition connected with the ground near the London University, was dramatized. See PORTER, MISS ANNA MARIA, No. 17. 8. Sir Edward Seaward's Narrative of his Shipwreck and Consequent Discovery of certain Islands in the Caribbean Sea; with a Detail of many extraordinary and highly interesting Events in his Life, from the Years 1733 to 1749; as written in his own Diary; edited by Miss Jane Porter, Lon. and N. York, 1831, 3 vols. 12mo; 2d ed., 1832, 3 vols. 12mo; new ed., 1841, 2 vols. p. 8vo. This clever fiction was as successful as De Foe's Voyage to the World of Cartesius (p. 490, supra) and Sir Thomas More's Utopia, (p. 1362, supra.) After elaborate researches among Admiralty records, Indian maps, &c., a critic in the London Quarterly Review gravely informs his readers,

"We are compelled to state that, notwithstanding its solemn and almost sacred character, it is neither more nor less than pure unmingled fiction from first to last."—Dec. 1832, 480–507.

Its literary ability the reviewer commends. The Monthly Reviewer (July, 1831, 354–377) was for a time deceived; but he retained his admiration of the story-teller after he had parted with his faith in the story. The Eclectic Review, the New Monthly Magazine, and the Spectator are also among the eulogists of the Narrative.

"At the merciless rummaging of Admiralty records and Indian maps, made by her critic, Miss Porter was more flattered than annoyed. When pressed to the real origin of 'Sir Edmund Seaward,' she would quietly say, 'Sir Walter Scott had his great secret; I must be allowed to keep my little one.'"—Lon. Gent. Mag., 1850, ii. 222.

In 1819 a tragedy by this lady, called Switzerland, in which Charles Kean played the principal part, was condemned at the Drury Lane Theatre: (see Blackw. Mag., iv. 714.)

In early life, in conjunction with Dr. T. F. Dibdin, Anna Maria and Robert Porter, she wrote for the Quiz, a weekly magazine, (see Prior's Life of Goldsmith, ii. 89–94; Dibdin's Reminiscences, 175;) she contributed the Life of Colonel Denham (p. 492, ante) to the Naval and Military Journal; the Life of Rev. Percival Stockdale (see Gent. Mag., 1850, ii. 364) to Gent. Mag., Oct. 1811, 384–390; and wrote for other periodicals. In America her works have had a wide circulation (uniform edit. pub. by Derby & Jackson, New York, 1857, &c.;) and in 1844 a number of the booksellers, publishers, and authors of the United States sent from New York to Miss Porter a handsome rosewood arm-chair, as a "memorial of high and respectful admiration" for the author of "some of the purest and most imaginative productions in the wide range of English literature." (See Gent. Mag., 1845, i. 173.) In addition to authorities already referred to, see Fraser's Mag., xi. 404, (with portrait;) Lon. Critic, July, 1859, and N. York Internat. Mag., i. 10, 201.

"It is to Miss Porter's fame that she began the system of historical novel-writing which attained the climax of its renown in the hands of Sir Walter Scott. And no light praise it is that she has thus pioneered the way for the greatest exhibition of the greatest genius of our time. She may parody Bishop Hall, and tell Sir Walter,

"I first adventured—follow me who list,
And be the second Scottish novelist."

Porter, Sir Robert Ker, Knt., K.C.H., b. at Durham, 1780, d. suddenly at St. Petersburg, 1842, has already been briefly noticed in our sketches of his sisters, Anna Maria and Jane Porter, (ante.) About 1790 he became a student of the Royal Academy, under the auspices of Benjamin West; in 1792 commenced his picture of Moses and Aaron for Shoreditch Church; in 1794 presented an altar-piece of Christ allaying the Storm to the Roman Catholic Chapel at Portsea; and in 1798 another, of St. John Preaching in the Wilderness, to St. John's College, Cambridge. He subsequently gained distinction by a number of great paintings,—among which were the battle-pieces of The Storming of Seringapatam, (exhibited A.D. 1800,) The Siege of Acre, (with a printed Companion, 1801, 8vo,) Agincourt, The Battle of Alexandria, and The Death of Sir Ralph Abercromby. In 1804 he visited Russia, and was appointed historical painter to the emperor, and gained the affections of the Princess Mary de Sherbatoff, whom he married in 1811, and who survived him. In 1808 he accompanied Sir John Moore's expedition to the Peninsula, and attended the campaign throughout to its melancholy termination at the battle of Corunna. From 1817 to 1820 he was engaged in his travels through the East; in 1819 was created a Knight of the Lion and Sun of Persia, and in 1832 Knight Commander of the Order of Hanover; from 1826 to 1841 was British Consul at Venezuela, residing at Caracas, (where he painted his Christ at the Last Supper, Our Saviour Blessing the Little Child, and Ecce Homo;) on May 3d, 1842, wrote from St. Petersburg of his intended visit to England, and on the next day died of apoplexy, after a parting visit to the emperor.

"Distinguished alike in the arts, in diplomacy, in war, and in literature, his loss will be regretted by the extended circle who appreciated his agreeable manners and extensive information."—Lon. Gent. Mag., July, 1842, 99, (Obituary,) q. v.

"We are now to make our readers acquainted with Mr. Ker Porter. He has long been known, we presume, to most of them, as a very ingenious artist: in this book he does not increase, nor indeed sustain, that reputation; nor does he add to it any considerable portion of literary fame, although he entitles himself to the much higher praise of amiable feelings."—Lord Brougham: Edin. Rev., April, 1809, 170–187.

"On the whole, we dismiss Mr. P.'s travels as a book which will seldom find a place in a library, but may lie without offence on a table; which, if not the best, is far from the worst, account of one of the most interesting countries in the world."—Bishop Heber: Lon. Quar. Rev., Nov. 1809, 288–301.

"One of the most valuable and interesting wo ks of the day."—Lon. Lit. Chron.

2. Letters from Portugal and Spain, &c., 1809, 8vo. Anon. 3. Narrative of the Campaign in Russia in 1812, 4to, 1813, 1814; 8vo, 1815. Contains valuable official documents.

"The circumstances are related in this volume from authority which cannot be disputed. It will be perused by all with an eager and an anxious interest."—British Critic, Aug. 1813.

4. Travels in Georgia, Persia, Armenia, Ancient Babylonia, &c., 1817, '18, '19, and '20, 2 vols. 4to, 1821–22, £9 9s. Vol. i. was reviewed in Month. Rev., xcvi. 1, and in Quar. Rev., xxvi. 437; vol. ii. in Month. Rev., c. 1, 136; both vols. in Blackw. Mag., xvi. 140. See, also, Phila. Museum, xi. 17; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 430; Lon. Athen., 1850, 731.

"The manners of the people and the face of the country through which he travelled are almost all that he attempts to describe; and even this he but indifferently executes."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxvi. 437.

"Few people have leisure to read so much about so little as we have here served up for our entertainment."—Blackw. Mag., xvi. 140.

"Were we inclined to season our commendation with any rebuke, we should condemn the inflated style of Sir Robert Porter; a fault which was strikingly conspicuous in his former Travels through Russia and Sweden."—Lon. Month. Rev., xcvi. 15: review of vol. i. The same fault is found (Ibid., c. 1, 2) with vol. ii.

"The narrative is executed in a pleasing and lively style; and these volumes form, on the whole, a valuable addition to our stock of knowledge of the countries described."—Dibdin: ut supra.

6. Summary of the Evidence of Christianity, ed. by

Boyd, 1850, 18mo; new ed., with Questions, &c., by Rev. Dr. Gardner, Edin., 1857, 32mo. In 1806 Dr. Porteus drew up a brief account of Fulham Palace and Gardens, &c., of which about 20 copies were privately printed: he requested that it might not be reprinted. In 1810, 8vo, (again, 1812, 8vo,) a Life of Bishop Porteus, by a Layman of Merton College, Oxford, was given to the world. It was censured by the Lon. Quar. Rev. (vii. 34) as "an ill-written, inaccurate, and meagre performance." There was also pub. a vol. entitled Porteusian Index, or Family Guide to the Holy Scriptures, Lon., 12mo. Hodgson's Life of Porteus, Chalmers's Biog. Dict., Nichols's Lit. Anec. and his Lit. Illust., Forbes's Life of Beattie, the British Critic for 1811, and the Lon. Quar. Review, March, 1812, 34–48, will reward the inquirer who seeks to know more of one of the best-beloved of English prelates since the Reformation.

"One of the brightest ornaments of the Church of England." —Bishop Percy.

"It might not be easy to name a prelate who has surpassed him in that rectitude of intention, benevolence of heart, and warmth of devotion which are the brightest graces of the Christian character."—Lon. Quar. Rev., vii. 48.

"Bishop Porteus was a light in his generation and to posterity, and an ornament to the times in which he lived."—Eclec. Rev.

"I am edified by his conversation."—Boswell to Johnson: Boswell, by Croker, ed. 1848, 639.

"He did much good by his mild, kind, and practical spirit; but the experienced Christian will perceive considerable deficiency in doctrinal statement."—Bickersteth's C.S., ed. 1844, 444.

Potter, Alonzo, D.D., LL.D., the son of a Revolutionary soldier, who was also a member of the New York Legislature, was b. in Dutchess county, N. York, July 10, 1800; graduated with first honours at Union College, Schenectady, 1818, and became tutor in the same institution the following year; ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Church, 1822, and Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Union College, 1822–26; declined the presidency of Geneva College, 1825, the Assistant Bishopric of Massachusetts, 1838, and from time to time refused other overtures of pastoral care and episcopal jurisdiction; Rector of St. Paul's Church, Boston, 1826–31; Vice-President of, and Professor of Moral Philosophy in, Union College, 1831–45; Bishop of the Prot. Epis. Church in the Diocese of Pennsylvania from Sept. 23, 1845, until his death, at San Francisco, California, on a visit for his health, July 4, 1865. He was buried at Laurel Hill, near Philadelphia, Aug. 11, 1865. Bishop Potter enjoyed a wide and well-deserved reputation for personal virtues, a remarkable range of erudition, and untiring zeal in the active duties of philanthropy,—alike evinced in the professional chair, the pastoral pulpit, and the discharge of the arduous responsibilities connected with a large and thriving episcopate. Author of: 1. Treatise on Logarithms. 2. Treatise on Descriptive Geometry. Both printed (we think never published) for the use of his classes when Prof. of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Union College, (1822–26.) 3. Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity, delivered in Philadelphia by Clergymen of the Prot. Epis. Church, 1853–54, Phila., 1855, 8vo, pp. 408. From the Introduction to this vol. (Apologetics) we have quoted on p. 679. The vol. contains fifteen Lectures, by as many clergymen. It was reviewed in Episcopal Review, April, 1855, 305, and in N. Amer. Rev., (by A. P. Peabody,) Jan. 1855, 305. 19. The Memorial, with Circular and Questions of the Episcopal Commission; with an Introduction, 1859.

The bishop also delivered five courses (60 lectures in all) of Lowell Institute Lectures, 1845, 1847, 1848, 1849, and 1853; and these we hope yet to see in print. One of his sermons, styled "a fair index of his pulpit productions," will be found in Fish's Pulpit Eloquence of the Nineteenth Century, 1857, 320–333; and to the biographical sketch prefixed to this Discourse, Men of the Time, N. York, 1852, 409, Dr. J. W. Francis's Old New York, 2d ed., 1858, 179, Proceed. Mass. Hist. Soc., 1862–63, 465, (see, also, Hist. Mag., 1862, 35,) and especially to Bishop Stevens's Funeral Sermon, Oct. 19, 1865, we refer the reader for testimonials to the virtues, the abilities, the attainments, and the labours of this ripe scholar, eminent prelate, and excellent man. The Rev. Dr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe, of Philadelphia, is now (1869) preparing a Life of Bishop Potter.

Potter, Barnabas, 1578 or 1579–1642, a native of Kendal, educated at, and Fellow of, Queen's College, Oxford, was elected Principal of Edmund Hall, 1610, but declined the office; Provost of Queen's College, 1616–26; Bishop of Carlisle, March 15, 1628–29. 1. Potter, Francis, 1594–1678, a native of Meyre, Wiltshire, educated at Trinity College, Oxford, Rector ot Kilmington, 1637; was a man of learning and mechanical ingenuity. An Interpretation of the Number 666, &c., Oxon., 1642, 4to. Idem, Latine, Amst., 1677, 8vo. Trans. by Thomas Gilbert and others. Also trans. into French and Dutch. It was attacked by Rev. Lambert Morehouse, to whom Potter wrote a Reply: neither of these pieces was ever published. A great authority thus commends Potter's Interpretation:

"This discourse of the Number of the Beast is the happiest that ever yet came into the world, and such as cannot be read (save of those that perhaps will not believe it) without much admiration."—JOSEPH MEDE.

"The warm eulogies of Gronovius attest the merit of this celebrated work. Potter was but twenty-three years of age; he had of course availed himself of the writings of Meursius, but he has also contrived to supersede them. It has been said that he is less exact in attending to the difference of times and places than our finer criticism requires."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 254.

Potter, Robert, 1721–1804, educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, was first appointed Vicar of Scarning; Preb. of Norwich in 1788; and Vicar of Lowestoft and Kessingland in 1789. 1. Poems, 1774, 8vo. 2. Observations on the Poor-Laws, &c., 1775, 8vo. 3. The Tragedies of Æschylus; trans., Lon., 1777, 4to; Notes, 1778, 4to; 2d ed., corrected, with the Notes, 1779, 2 vols. 8vo; again, Oxf., 1808, 8vo; Lon., 1809, 8vo; 1812, 8vo 1831, 12mo; 1833, 12mo; N. York, 1834, 18mo. This translation has been much praised. Mr. John Symmons, however, in the Preface to his trans. of the Agamemnon, 1824, 8vo, disputes the popular verdict; and Prof. Wilson, in Blackw. Mag., Aug. 1831, 359 et seq., (repub. in Wilson's Works, vol. viii., 1857, 407 et seq.,—Greek Drama,) endorses Symmons's dissent, though not without awarding Potter great merit. See, also, Lon. Month. Rev., cvi. 120, 228. Mr. Harris thought Potter's Æschylus "very pretty;" Dr. Johnson characterised what little he had read of it as "verbiage," (see Boswell, by Croker, ed. 1848, 582;) and Sir James Mackintosh (see his Life, vol. i. chap. v.) read it with "very great admiration." See, also, Nichols's Lit. Anec., viii. 430; Nichols's Lit. Illust., viii. 447; H. Walpole's Letters, ed. 1861, vii. 24; WODHULL, MICHAEL, No. 6.

4. The Tragedies of Euripides; trans., 2 vols. 4to: i., 1781; ii., 1783; 2d ed., Lon., 1808, 2 vols. 8vo; again, Oxf., 1814, 2 vols. 8vo; Lon., 1832, 3 vols. 12mo; N. York, 1834–35, 3 vols. 18mo. Considered inferior to his trans. of Æschylus and Sophocles. He did not include translations of the Fragments. See WODHULL, MICHAEL, No. 6. 5. An Enquiry into some Passages of Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets, 1783, 4to. Censured as "petulant and unworthy of liberal criticism." See H. Walpole's Letters, (to Mason,) ed. 1861, viii. 376. 6. The Tragedies of Sophocles; trans., Lon., 1788, 4to; Oxf., 1808, 8vo. A literal version, and not without elegance and spirit, but surpassed by the translation of Rev. Thomas Dale, 1824, 2 vols. 8vo, which is based on Potter. See Symmons's Pref. to his trans. of the Agamemnon; Blackw. Mag., xxx. 359, (by Prof. Wilson, ut supra;) Lon. Quar. Powell, or Powel, Edward, D.D., a learned R. Catholic divine, Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, 1495, gained the favour of Henry VIII. by opposing Luther in his Propugnaculum summi Sacerdotii Evangelici, Lon., 1523, 4to, and lost his head by pleading for Catherine in his Tractatus de non Dissolvendo Henrici Regis cum Catherina Matrimonia, Lib. i. His advocacy of the supremacy of the Roman see was indeed one of the articles on which he was condemned. He was hanged, drawn, and quartered at Smithfield, July 30, 1540, along with Dr. Richard Fetherstone and Dr. Thomas Able: see ABLE, or ABEL, THOMAS. Respecting Powell, see Bliss's Wood's Athen. Power, Robert. Miscellaneous Poems, Lon., 2 vols. p. 8vo.

Power, Thomas. Masonic Melodies, Bost., 1844, 8vo.

Power, Tyrone, 1795–1841, according to one version, was the son of an Irish gentleman, of the county of Waterford, and whilst still an infant was taken by his widowed mother to her new residence at Glamorganshire, South Wales.

According to another version,

"In point of fact, Power was a native of Swansea, in Wales, where he served his apprenticeship to the printing-business, and did newspaper work in England as a journeyman compositor before he went on the stage. As a printer, his name was Thomas Powell, which he converted to Tyrone Power after he had been for some time on the stage at Newcastle-upon-Tyne."—Amer. Lit. Gaz., Nov. 15, 1866, 49.

At the town of Cardiff, a short distance from his home, young Power found a theatre, and soon "trod the boards" in the character of Romeo, "time out of mind" the débutant's favourite "first character." After some experience in tragedy, he threw away the dagger and became famous in Irish comedy,—to suit which he manufactured an admirable brogue,—inferior, indeed, to "Irish Johnstone's," which was genuine, but good enough to pass for original. In 1818 he retired from the stage, but returned in 1821; became manager of the Olympic Theatre in 1823, and appeared with no success at Drury Lane in the same year; in 1824 achieved a triumph as Paddy O'Halloran, and henceforth devoted himself to Irish characters; travelled in America in 1833, '34, and '35, and pub. his Impressions of America in 2 vols. 8vo in 1836, (repub. in Phila. in same year, 2 vols. 12mo, and commended by Lon. Month. Rev., 1836, i. 297;) made a second tour through the United States in 1840, and sailed from New York for England, March 11, 1841, on board the steam-ship "President:" neither the vessel nor any of the 123 souls on board were ever heard of from that day. Mr. Power also pub. two novels, —The King's Secret, 3 vols. p. 8vo, and Cauth Malowney, or the Last Heir, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1858, 12mo. See, also, PICKEN, ANDREW, No. 5; Atlantic Monthly, Jan. 1860.

Praed, Winthrop Mackworth, 1802–1839, a native of London, son of Mr. Serjeant Praed, educated at Eton and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he gained distinction both as a scholar and as an orator; took his degree of B.A., 1825; was called to the Bar, 1829; returned to Parliament for St. Germans, 1830 and 1831; unsuccessfully contested St. Ives with Mr. Halse, in 1832; returned for Great Yarmouth, 1835, and in the same year was married to Miss Helen Bogle; Secretary to the Board of Control, Dec. 1834–April, 1835; subsequently M.P. for Aylesbury, Recorder of Barnstaple, and Deputy High Steward for the University of Cambridge. As a parliamentary speaker he was chiefly noted for his opposition to the Reform Bill. Praed's contributions to The Etonian have been referred to on a preceding page. (See MOULTRIE, JOHN.) He was also one of the chief contributors in prose and poetry to his friend Charles Knight's Quarterly Magazine, and published largely in the New Monthly and the Annuals. In 1844 the Rev. R. W. Griswold pub. at New York a volume of Praed's poems; and an enlarged edition (Lillian, and other Poems, 12mo) in 1850; reprinted, 1 vol. 12mo, 1852, '53, '55, '56. The fourth American edition, edited, with a Memoir, by W. H. Whitmore, was issued (also N. York, by Redfield) in 1859, 2 vols. 12mo. A notice of this edition, (which contains many of Fitzgerald's poems, mistaken for Praed's,) written by the editor, will be found in the North American Review for October, 1859, 536–546. At last the long-promised complete edition of his Poetical Works, containing many of his juvenile pieces, contributed by his sister, Lady Young, prefaced by a Memoir by the Rev. Derwent Coleridge, late Principal of St. Mark's College, Chelsea, was published by Moxon, Lon., Aug. 23, 1864, 2 vols. fp. 8vo, 14*s*., cr. 8vo, 24*s*.; 2d ed., Nov. 1, 1864; 3d ed., 1869; (Selection from the Works of, edited by Sir G. Young, 1866, 16mo;) republished, N. York, Redfield, Nov. 1, 1864, 2 vols. cr. 8vo, some l. p.; 2d ed., June, 1865, 2 vols. blue and gold. See Lon. Reader, 1864, ii. 284; Chris. Mag., i. 230, 369–372, 523, v. 420; Home Journal, (Recollections of Praed, by N. P. Willis: also in the last edition of his poems.) Among the best-known of Praed's poems are Lillian, The Troubadour, School and School Fellows, Palinodia, The Vicar, Josephine, Arminius, The Red Fisherman, The Bridal of Belmont, Memory, The Belle of the Ball, Time's Changes, Gog, The Legend of the Drachenfels, The Legend of the Teufel-Haus, The Bachelor, Quince, My Partner, Sir Hilary, and other charades. Miss Mitford cannot say enough in commendation of Praed's pieces:

"That these poems are the most graceful and finished verses of society that can be found in our language, it is impossible to doubt."—Recollec. of a Lit. Life.

Mr. Whitmore has proved his admiration of the poet by the pains devoted to his editorial labours, (ut supra.)

"In conclusion," he remarks, p. 546, "we may say that, while few poets have written purer verse than he, few satirists have done their task with more gentleness."

"Praed's fancy was airy, bright, and arabesque. It enabled him, with his easy command of poetical expression, to produce picturesque sketches with equal grace and facility. . . . His prose is almost as quaintly and pensively playful as his verse. We have little doubt that if his correspondence were selected from, it would display all those qualities that sparkle so gracefully in his published pieces."—Lon. Athen., 1852, 909, 910.

Prentice, George Denison, b. Dec. 18, 1802, at Preston, New London; graduated at Brown University, 1823, and subsequently studied law. The editorial desk presenting greater attractions than the Bar, Mr. Prentice in 1828 commenced the New England Weekly Review, which he published at Hartford for two years, resigning it to his fellow-poet, Mr. J. G. Whittier. In 1831 Mr. Prentice became connected with the paper which he has since made so famous,—the Louisville (Daily) Journal. From his editorial chair, which he has now occupied (we write in 1869) for thirty-eight years, Mr. Prentice has kept up an energetic and brilliant warfare against his political opponents. It was well remarked, in a recent publication,

"The 'Prenticeiana' of the editor are famous. If collected and published, with appropriate notes, these mots would form an amusing and instructive commentary on the management of elections, newspaper literature, and political oratory, of permanent value as a memorial of the times."—Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit., 1856, ii. 400.

This hint has not been lost: a collection of Prenticeiana, or Wit and Humour in Paragraphs, in 1 volume 12mo, was pub. in New York in 1859. The announcement of this work in London led to an amusing blunder on the part of the London Bookseller, a monthly organ of the publishers:

"We observe," remarks the editor of this periodical, "a book announced on an almost forgotten subject, 'Prenticeiana.' Mrs. Ellis may be reminded by this that the 'prentices of England have never yet been the subject of a history."

See Lon. Lit. Gaz., 1860, and N. Brit. Rev., Nov. 1860, Art. VII.: American Humour, (by Gerald Massey.) The volume found little favour in the eyes of the Lon Athen and Lon. Leader, 1860.

We are informed that Mr. Prentice will follow up this volume by a collection of his poetical contributions—which have been numerous—to the periodicals. Specimens of these, with notices of their popular author, will be found in Everest's Poets of Connecticut; Gallagher's Selections from the Poetical Literature of the West; Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America; Duyckincks' Cyclopædia of American Literature; Coppée's Gallery of Famous English and American Poets; Cleveland's Compendium of American Literature; and Coggeshall's Poets and Poetry of the West. See, also, Trübner's Bibliographical Guide to American Literature, ed. 1859, lix. Among Mr. Prentice's best-known poems are: The Flight of Years; The Closing Year; To a Lady; Sabbath Evening; The Dead Mariner; Written at my Mother's Grave; To My Wife. But (like the "twofold operation of the good sherris-sack") Mr. Prentice is not only poetical himself, but he is the cause of poetry, as well as of wit, in others: some of the best female writers in the West (the lamented "Amelia" Welby was one of the most popular) have owed their first introduction to the public to the columns of the Louisville Journal. We have already noticed (vide p. 394, supra) Mr. Prentice's biographical sketch of his friend of many years, Henry Clay. (See N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1831, 351–396, by Alex. H. Everett.)

Prentiss, Sergeant Smith, b. at Portland, Maine, 1808; graduated at Bowdoin College, 1826; admitted to the Natchez (Mississippi) Bar, 1829; removed to Vicksburg, 1832; elected to the State Legislature, 1835, and to the National House of Representatives, 1837; removed to New Orleans, La., 1845; d. at Longwood, near Natchez, 1851. Mr. Prentiss was one of the most eloquent of American orators. Several of his speeches and forensic arguments were printed from time to time. A specimen of his oratory,—New England Address, 1845,—preceded by a sketch of his life, will be found in Moore's American Eloquence, 1857, ii. 579–587. See, also, A Memoir of Sergeant S. Prescott, Oliver, M.D., 1762–1827, a native of Groton, Mass., a nephew of Colonel William Prescott, of Bunker Hill, graduated at Harvard College in 1783, and subsequently practised medicine at Groton and at Newburyport. He was greatly esteemed, and held several municipal and state offices. He contributed some valuable articles to the New England Journal of Medicine and Surgery, but is best known by the Annual Discourse before the Massachusetts Medical Society, in 1813, entitled Dissertation on the Natural History and Medicinal Effects of the Secale Cornutum, or Ergot. This able treatise was reprinted at Philadelphia and London, trans. into French and German, and repub. in full, so far as relates to the medicinal properties of Ergot, in the article Ergot, in Dictionnaire des Sciences Médicales, vol. xiii. Prescott, William Hickling, May 4, 1796–Jan. 28, 1859, a son of the late Judge William Prescott, of Boston, and a grandson of Colonel William Prescott, who commanded at Bunker Hill, June 17, 1775, first saw the light at Salem, Massachusetts, where his father resided between 1789 and 1808. In the latter year Judge Prescott removed to Boston, and William became a scholar of Dr. Gardiner, who had himself been disciplined by the famous pedagogue who lit his torch at Bellenden's heathen altar, bearing the inscription De Tribus Luminibus Romanorum. In 1811 young Prescott entered Harvard College,—where his classical predilections and attainments would have elicited the commendation of his literary grandsire, Dr. Parr, himself,—graduated with distinguished honour in 1814, and would at once have devoted himself, under the brightest auspices, to the profession adorned by the learning and reputation of his father, but for the results of one of those thoughtless acts of mischievous folly the effects of which so often punish the transgressor and his victim, and sometimes embitter the remaining years of a long life. At a college dinner in his Junior year, an under-graduate threw at random a large, hard piece of bread, which struck one of Prescott's eyes, and, for all useful purposes, closed it forever on the world. His other eye was soon sympathetically affected; and the youthful student, to whom life had but yesterday seemed so bright and hope-inspiring, was now obliged to turn his back upon the sun and all that it gladdens, and, at a later period, for many weary months to submit to the imprisonment of a darkened room.

Thus early tried in the furnace of affliction, he was not found unequal to his probation. "In all that trying season," said his mother, "I never groped my way across the apartment to take my place by his side, that he did not greet me with some hearty expression of good cheer, as if we were the patients and it were his place to comfort us."

In the autumn of 1815 he visited Europe, and passed two years in England, France, and Italy, in seeking and gaining instruction both from books and men, and delighting not the less in the charms of nature because by him they could be seen only "as through a glass, darkly." For this infirmity of vision, indeed, he found no cure; but he returned to his home more in love than ever with the great deeds and great thoughts of the men of renown of the older days, and with a resolute determination that the "ample page of knowledge, rich with the spoils of time," if obscured to his external organs, should be no stranger to his intellectual vision. But no one can tell the story so well as it was related by the student himself, in a letter, written eighteen months before his death, to the Rev. George E. Ellis, and by this gentleman published in the Massachusetts Teacher for July, 1857:

"I suppose you are aware that when in college I received an injury in one eye, which deprived me of the use of it for reading and writing. An injudicious use of the other eye, on which the burden of my studies was now wholly thrown, brought on a rheumatic inflammation, which deprived me entirely of sight for some weeks. When this was restored, the eye remained in too irritable a state to be employed in reading for several years. I consequently abandoned the study of the law, upon which I had entered; and, as a man must find something to do, I determined to devote myself to letters, in which independent career I could regulate my own hours with reference to what my sight might enable me to accomplish.

"I had early conceived a strong passion for historical writing, to which, perhaps, the reading of Gibbon's autobiography contributed not a little. I proposed to make myself a historian in the best sense of the term, and hoped to produce something which posterity would not willingly let die. In a memorandum-book, as far back as the year 1819, I find the desire intimated; and I proposed to devote ten years of my life to the study of ancient and modern literatures,—chiefly the latter,—and to give ten years more to some historical work. I have had the good fortune to accomplish this design pretty nearly within the limits assigned. In the Christmas of 1837 my first work, the History of Ferdinand and Isabella, was given to the public.

"During my preliminary studies in the field of general literature, my eyes gradually acquired so much strength that I was enabled to use them many hours of the day. The result of my studies at this time I was in the habit of giving, in the form of essays, in public journals,—chiefly in the North American,—from which a number, quite large enough, have been transferred to a separate volume of Miscellanies. Having settled on a subject for a particular history, I lost no time in collecting the materials, for which I had peculiar advantages. But, just before these materials arrived, my eye had experienced so severe a strain that I enjoyed no use of it again, for reading, for several years. It has, indeed, never since fully recovered its strength, nor have I ever ventured to use it again by candlelight. I well remember the blank despair which I felt when my literary treasures arrived from Spain, and I saw the mine of wealth lying around me, which I was forbidden to explore. I determined to see what could be done with the eyes of another. I remembered that Johnson had said, in reference to Milton, that the great poet had abandoned his projected History of England, finding it scarcely possible for a man without eyes to pursue a historical work requiring reference to various authorities. The remark piqued me to make an attempt.

"I obtained the services of a reader who knew no language but his own. I taught him to pronounce the Castilian in a manner suited, I suspect, much more to my ear than to that of a Spaniard; and we began our wearisome journey through Mariana's noble history. I cannot even now call to mind without a smile the tedious hours in which, seated under some old trees in my country residence, we pursued our slow and melancholy way over pages which afforded no glimmering of light to him, and from which the light came dimly struggling to me through a half-intelligible vocabulary. But in a few weeks the light became stronger, and I was cheered by the consciousness of my own improvement; and when we had toiled our way through seven quartos, I found I could understand the book when read about two-thirds as fast as ordinary English. My reader's office required the more patience: he had not even this result to cheer him in his labour.

"I now felt that the great difficulty could be overcome; and I obtained the services of a reader whose acquaintance with modern and ancient tongues supplied, as far as it could be supplied, the deficiency of eyesight on my part. But, though in this way I could examine various authorities, it was not easy to arrange in my mind the results of my reading, drawn from different and often contradictory accounts. To do this I dictated copious notes as I went along, and, when I had read enough for a chapter,—from thirty to forty, and sometimes fifty, pages in length,—I had a mass of memoranda in my own language, which would easily bring before me at one view the fruits of my researches. These notes were carefully read to me; and while my recent studies were fresh in my recollection I ran over the whole of my intended chapter in my mind. This process I repeated at least half a dozen times, so that when I finally put my pen to paper it ran off pretty glibly, for it was an effort of memory rather than creation. This method had the advantage of saving me from the perplexity of frequently referring to the scattered passages in the originals, and it enabled me to make the corrections in my own mind which are usually made in the manuscript, and which with my mode of writing—as I shall explain—would have much embarrassed me. Yet I must admit that this method of composition, when the chapter was very long, was somewhat too heavy a strain on the memory to be altogether recommended.

"Writing presented me a difficulty even greater than reading. Thierry, the famous blind historian of the Norman Conquest, advised me to cultivate dictation; but I have usually preferred a substitute that I found in a writing-case made for the blind, which I procured in London forty years since. It is a simple apparatus, often described by me for the benefit of persons whose vision is imperfect. It consists of a frame of the size of a sheet of paper, traversed by brass wires as many as lines are wanted on the page, and with a sheet of carbonated paper, such as is used for getting duplicates, pasted on the reverse side. With an ivory or agate stylus the writer traces his characters between the wires on the carbonated sheet, making indelible marks, which he cannot see, on the white page below. This treadmill operation has its defects; and I have repeatedly supposed I had accomplished a good page, and was proceeding in all the glow of composition to go ahead, when I found I had forgotten to insert a sheet of my writing-paper below, that my labour had all been thrown away, and that the leaf looked as blank as myself. Notwithstanding these and other whimsical distresses of the kind, I have found my writing-case my best friend in my lonely hours, and with it have written nearly all that I have sent into the world the last forty years.

"The manuscript thus written, and deciphered—for it was in the nature of hieroglyphics—by my secretary, was then read to me for corrections, and copied off in a fair hand for the printer. All this, it may be thought, was rather a slow process, requiring the virtue of patience in all the parties concerned. But in time my eyes improved again. Before I had finished 'Ferdinand and Isabella,' I could use them some hours every day. And thus they have continued till within a few years, though subject to occasional interruptions, sometimes of weeks, and sometimes of months, when I could not look at a book. And this circumstance, as well as habit,—second nature,—has led me to adhere still to my early method of composition. Of late years I have suffered, not so much from inability of the eye, as dimness of the vision, and the warning comes that the time is not far distant when I must rely exclusively on the eyes of another for the prosecution of my studies. Perhaps it should be received as a warning that it is time to close them altogether."

Thus, as we have seen, after many years of conscientious labour, Mr. Prescott had the gratification of presenting to his father and a few chosen literary advisers—among whom were the eminent scholars George Ticknor and Jared Sparks—the results of his "long night of toil." This "audience, fit though few," he thought not of enlarging. "I have had the gratification of writing the work," he remarked to his father, "and shall place it on my library-shelf for those who come after me." But in Judge Prescott's case, fortunately for the world, the heart of the father and the head of the scholar were united, and to the proposed entombment of so much lore of wisdom and of beauty he would by no means consent. He appealed, however, not to the claims of literary ambition, but used an argument well suited to the grandson of the grim chieftain of Bunker Hill,—him for whom Colonel Willard made the memorable endorsement to General Gage, and whom the great Washington delighted to call "Prescott the brave." "The man who writes a book which he is afraid to publish," said Judge Prescott to his son, "is a coward." Now, it was never known that a Prescott was "a coward;" and it was not for the first author of the family to obscure the family laurels.

Mr. Sparks's advice on this point shall be given in his own words:

"It is known that Mr. Prescott's eyesight was then so feeble that it was difficult for him to read; and, for the purpose of carefully preparing the composition of his work, he had it printed in large type, in quarto form, so that he could read it and correct it for the press, instead of revising it in manuscript. After it was finished, he sent me his two volumes, printed as I have described, and requested me to read them. I did so, of course, with very great pleasure and profit, and with no little surprise at the success of the writer, under his infirmity of sight, in accomplishing the work in so thorough and finished a manner. I returned the volumes, and soon after saw Mr. Prescott. He asked me, with a good deal of diffidence, what I thought of the book. I told him there could be but one opinion about it; that I had read the book with great delight, and thought he had written one of the most successful works of its kind that had come before the public. 'But perhaps,' said he, 'you have read it under the bias of some degree of partiality and friendly feeling?' I told him I could not say as to that, but I had been exceedingly gratified with the perusal of the book. He then asked, 'Do you think it should be published?' 'To be sure,' I replied: 'have you not written it to be published?' He still expressed doubts, and enumerated objections. In the first place, the subject was not one likely to interest American readers: it related to Spain, and times long past. In the next place, he doubted very much whether the composition and execution of the work were of such a character as would make it attractive. His opinion was, in short, that it would not succeed. Of course I used what arguments I could, and told him that no impression of that sort could be entertained by any mind but his own. I left him, however, in that state of uncertainty. Mr. Gray has explained how he was induced to publish the work at last. The anecdote is characteristic of Mr. Prescott, and illustrates his modesty and entire freedom from self-estimation."—Remarks of Jared Sparks, LL.D.: Proceedings of the Mass. Hist. Soc. in Respect to the Memory of W. H. Prescott, Feb. 1, 1859, 17–19. See, also, 10–13; and (Mr. Gray's reference to Judge Prescott's influence in causing the publication of Ferdinand and Isabella) 16–17.

The success of the History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella was great and immediate. It was published in Germany, France, and Spain, in the respective languages of those countries; appeared in an Italian version at Florence, 1847–48, 3 vols. 8vo; and early in 1858 a translation in Russ was announced in Russia. Some bibliographical details connected with this work and Mr. Prescott's subsequent publications are reserved for later pages of our sketch. The original materials for the History of Ferdinand and Isabella now repose, in accordance with the bequest of the author, in the Library of Harvard College. Of the compliments showered upon the successful historian, not the least valued, and one certainly amply earned, was his election to membership by the Spanish Royal Academy of History, which holds its sessions in the city of Madrid. Thus cordially encouraged by the most eminent representatives of letters in many climes, Mr. Prescott again resumed his laborious studies, and in 1843 gave to the world the History of the Conquest of Mexico, and in 1847 his History of the Conquest of Peru. These works, the fruit of the most painstaking investigations into manuscript authorities procured from Spain, proved that the critics at home and abroad, if prompt and cordial, had not been too hasty in the designation of the elevated status which from the first day of the publication of the History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella they had assigned to its author. At least one of the Mexican editions (there were two) of the Conquest of Mexico was garbled by the translator to suit the political and religious atmosphere of the country: the Madrid edition is not liable to this grave inculpation. To the French translation, by M. Amédée Pichot, a reference by Mr. Prescott will be found in the Preface to the Conquest of Peru, xiii. In 1845 Mr. Prescott was induced to publish, under the title of Biographical and Critical Miscellanies, a selection of twelve papers from his articles contributed to the North American Review between the years 1821 and 1843, and a Memoir of Charles Brockden Brown, originally published in Sparks's American Biography in 1834. In the editions of the Miscellanies issued since 1851 will be found a valuable paper entitled Spanish Literature: being a review published in the North American Review for January, 1850, of Mr. Ticknor's admirable History of Spanish Literature, first issued in 1849, 3 vols. 8vo. The new editions of the Miscellanies are affectionately dedicated to Mr. Ticknor as a memorial of "studies pursued together in earlier days." This collection will be noticed more at length hereafter. In the summer of 1850 Mr. Prescott visited England, and in the autumn spent a short time in Scotland and on the continent.

"Many years before," remarks Mr. Stirling, (Encyc. Brit.,) "he had passed through England as a young and comparatively unknown traveller; he now returned to it the American whom of all others, perhaps, intelligent Englishmen were most desirous to see and converse with. During his sojourn in London, Mr. Prescott was one of the most observed and popular personages in a society ever 'to famous wits native or hospitable.' In truth, he did not need his fame to aid his social success. His fine presence and countenance, his pleasing conversation, and his perfect manners would have ensured him a welcome even as a nameless stranger."

In 1855 Mr. Prescott published the first and second volumes, and in December, 1858, the third volume, of what would have proved, had it been completed, his greatest work,—The History of the Reign of Philip the Second, King of Spain. These volumes fully sustained—to elevate would have been scarcely possible—the reputation of the author as an accurate chronicler and eloquent narrator. Vols. i. and ii. appeared in Russ in Russia, 1858. Between the publication of vols. i. and ii. and iii. of Philip II., i.e. in 1857, he had added to a new edition of Robertson's History of the Reign of Charles the Fifth, Boston, 3 vols. 8vo, a supplement, (pp. 327–510, vol. iii.,) entitled The Life of Charles the Fifth after his Abdication. Early in 1858 the apprehensions of Mr. Prescott's friends were aroused by a slight stroke of paralysis, from the effects of which he never entirely recovered, although he was soon able to resume his daily walks, and to spend two or three hours a day amidst his books and papers without any immediate inconvenience. On the 28th of January, 1859, he rose apparently well, and proposed to take a walk at his usual hour; but, as the morning was wet, he was persuaded by Mrs. Prescott to stay within. A few hours afterwards he left his secretary in the library, and stepped into an adjoining apartment, and, almost immediately after crossing the threshold, was seized with a second stroke of paralysis, of which he expired about two o'clock in the afternoon. The melancholy intelligence, as it was telegraphed from city to city over the wide land for which he had won "a name and a praise in the earth," produced a profound sensation of sorrow, which was testified by mournful gatherings and reverential tributes. Of the latter, one of the most interesting is from the pen of the Rev. William H. Milburn,—being an account of a conversation held with Mr. Prescott only forty-eight hours before his decease:

"On the evening in question," remarks Mr. Milburn, "Wednesday, January 26, Mr. Prescott entered the library with a slower and heavier step than when I had been in the habit of seeing him years before; but his manner had the same unaffected simplicity and cordial warmth. Whether a stranger would have perceived it, I cannot say; but my ear, sharpened by necessity, [see p. 1277, supra] at once detected the work of paralysis in an occasional thickening of the speech. I mean a difficulty in perfect articulation now and then. . . . He then proceeded to a mention of various mutual friends that had passed away since our last meeting; especially of the Hon. Abbott Lawrence and Francis C. Gray, Esq., at whose dinner-table we had often met, and then of some surviving friends, especially of George Ticknor, Esq., who, he said, had shortened and brightened what, but for him, must have been many a sad and weary hour. . . . He added, 'I suppose that Ticknor will never write another book; but he has been doing perhaps better for the community and posterity by devoting himself for several years to the interests of the Boston City Library, which may be taken in good part as his work; and a more valuable contribution to the good of the people has seldom been made. It is a rare thing for such an institution to get a man so rarely qualified by taste, knowledge, and accomplishment, to look after its interests with such energy and patience.' . . . I said, 'Mr. Prescott, are you not coming to New York? We should all be very glad to see you there.' 'No,' he replied; 'I suppose that the days of my long journeys are over. I must content myself, like Horace, with my three houses. You know I go at the commencement of summer to my cottage by the sea-side at Lynn Beach; and at autumn to my patrimonial acres at Pepperell, which have been in our family for two hundred years, to sit under the old trees I sat under when a boy; and then with winter come down to hibernate in this house. This is the only travelling, I suppose, that I shall do until I go to my long home. . . . He then spoke in glowing and grateful terms, as I alluded to the interest taken in his health throughout the country, to the kindness which he had invariably experienced at the hands of his countrymen: 'I can never,' he said, 'be sufficiently grateful for the tokens of esteem, regard, and affection which I have had from them through all the years of my literary career. True, it makes me feel like an old man to see my fifteen volumes upon the shelf; but my heart is as young as it ever was to enjoy the love which the country has ever shown me.' When I said it was a cheering thing for a man to know he had given so much happiness as he had done by his books, he said that it was his own truest happiness to trust that he had been able to confer it. He said he hoped to live to finish Philip, which was now three-fifths done. As I bade him goodbye, I said, 'God bless you, Mr. Prescott; I know I breathe the prayer of the country when I say, May your life be spared many years to add volume after volume to the fifteen.' He rejoined, 'My greatest delight is the love of my friends and their appreciation of my labours.' Little did I think that the hand which so warmly grasped mine as he led me down the stairs would, ere eight-and-forty hours were passed, be cold and stiff in death. Peace to the memory of one of the sweetest and noblest of men that ever lived!"—Harper's Weekly, Feb. 12, 1859.

This is a true saying, and can be confirmed by "a cloud of witnesses" whose testimonials lie around us; but more of this anon.

Mr. Prescott left a widow, two sons, and a daughter. Having thus given a rapid summary of Mr. Prescott's literary career, we proceed to consider his publications more in detail, and shall conclude our sketch with some notices of his general characteristics as an author, and of his virtues as a man.

1. HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF FERDINAND AND ISABELLA THE CATHOLIC, Boston, American Stationers' Company, (Dec. 25, 1837, dated) 1838, 3 vols. 8vo; last ed., Phila., J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1868, 3 vols. 8vo. Repub. in England, France, Italy, and Germany, Lon., 1838, 3 vols. 8vo. Pub. by R. Bentley, who continued to republish Prescott's works in London as they appeared, until the latter part of 1858, when he disposed of his interest to the present sole publishers, Routledge, Warne, and Routledge, the senior of which firm had also previously published editions of Prescott's works. 12th London ed. of Ferdinand and Isabella, 1859, viz.: I., Lib. ed., 2 vols. demy 8vo, steel plates, 21*s.*; II., Cab. ed., 3 vols. p. 8vo, steel plates, 12*s.*; III., 1 vol. ed., cr. 8vo, 5*s.*; IV., Cheap ed., 2 vols. fp. 8vo, bds. 4*s.*, cl. 5*s.*; adv. to 5*s.* 1861. Copies printed in the United States and London to Jan. 1, 1860, 17,731. Before taking up, or after finishing, this work, the author should turn to Mr. Prescott's remarks on the Saracen dominion in Spain, the conquest of Granada, and the policy of Ferdinand and Isabella, in his review of Irving's Conquest of Granada, 1829, 2 vols. 12mo, published in the North American Review for October, 1829, 293–314. It is not to be denied that the portion of history selected by Mr. Prescott for illustration in these volumes had been neglected by the scholars of Germany, France, and England, and only superficially touched by Italian writers: it is equally certain that at an earlier date no faithful narration of the events of this reign could have been given to the world. In the days of Robertson, "the highways" of Spanish history may be truly said to have been "unoccupied, and the travellers"—the few adventurous travellers—"walked through by-ways,"—the "by-ways" of crumbling libraries in ruined monasteries and chaotic state-paper archives, guarded by the vigilant care of the Holy Office, —a vigilance only to be soothed by policy, seduced by guile, or soporated by gold. But Mr. Prescott had the advantage of the tragic annals of Llorente, the political disquisitions of Mariana, Sempere, and Capmany, the literal version of the Spanish-Arab Chronicles by Condé, the Coleccion de los Viages of Navarrete, (see IRVING, WASHINGTON, p. 941,) the invaluable illustrations of Isabella's reign by Mr. Secretary Clemencin, many rare works and curious manuscripts purchased by his friend George Ticknor, in Spain, for his own library, and unpublished documents of priceless value, collected from all available quarters, under the directions of the historian, by the zealous agency of Alexander H. Everett, Arthur Middleton, and the learned biblicpole, Mr. O. Rich. So copious were the materials; but they were materials only,—useless save to the plastic hand of genius,—and with most men—with most zealous and dexterous scholars, even—they would either have remained unused, or would, from want of skill in the workmanship, have "perished with the using." Courage less resolute would not have projected, industry less patient would have hardly persevered in, taste less exquisite could never have so beautifully accomplished, the erection of this great monument. With what admiration it was hailed by foreign scholars on the continent of Europe, we have already seen. What was the verdict of the most eminent of English and American critical authorities? The adduction of some of these we shall preface by a brief citation from the review of the work in the Edinburgh Review, from the accomplished English pen of Don Pascual de Gayangos, (the learned translator of the Mahommedan Dynasties in Spain,) than whom there is no higher authority. (See Ferd. and Is., 3d Lon. ed., 1841, Pref.; Philip II., i., Pref., v.–viii., iii. 13, n.; Eng. Cyc., Biog., iv., 1856, 43; Lon. Athen., 1840, 103, 1844, 55.)

"To combine and put together the immense materials respecting this reign; to ascertain the truth by adjusting the contradictory accounts of the Spanish and foreign writers; in one word, to write a history of that interesting period, endowed with all the graces of modern scholarship, and illustrated by the philosophical spirit of our age, was a task which still remained to be performed. How far it has been accomplished by Mr. Prescott, an American gentleman, who (under peculiar circumstances which he fully details in his preface, and which we shall hereafter notice) has devoted to it ten years of his life, we shall now proceed to examine. . . Mr. Prescott's merit chiefly consists in the skilful arrangement of his materials, in the spirit of philosophy which animates the work, and in a clear and elegant style that charms and interests the reader. He has now and then, by relying too much on his authorities, fallen into slight mistakes. . . . We shall here conclude by stating, generally, that Mr. Prescott's work is one of the most successful historical productions of our time. Besides the merits which we have already alluded to, the author possesses one which, in our opinion, is worth all the rest—that is, impartiality. The inhabitant of another world, he seems to have shaken off all the prejudices of ours; he has written a history without party-spirit, and without bias of any sort. In a word, he has, in every respect, made a most valuable addition to our historical literature."—January, 1839, 378, 397, 404–405.

It was Mr. Prescott's fate—it proved to be also his felicity—to be tried before learned judges and exacting critics. The editor of the London Quarterly placed upon the Bench that terror to all pretended enthusiasts in Andalusian scenery and Catalan customs, the late author of the famous Hand-Book, (see p. 614, supra,) who is, or who ought to be, known by the sobriquet of "Spanish Ford." Mr. Ford deals out praise and censure with great apparent impartiality: we give some specimens of each:

"Many of his notes . . . are extremely unsatisfactory. Of the accuracy of his quotations and references we cannot speak too highly; they stamp a guarantee on his narrative; they enable us to give a reason for our faith; they furnish means of questioning and correcting the author himself; they enable readers to follow up any particular subject suited to their own idiosyncrasy,—for selections indicate rather the genius of the selector than that of the work from which he draws. This research and fidelity appear to be the marked features of Mr. Prescott's talent, which is synthetical, not analytical. He can collect facts, arrange details, and present a faithful and agreeable picture of the shell and husk of history. He is less successful in his attempts to unravel the web, to separate causes from effects, to distinguish motives from pretexts,—in a word, to catch a fixed, definite insight into the spirit of the fifteenth century. . . . His style is too often sesquipedalian and ornate; the stilty, wordy, false taste of Dr. Channing, without his depth of thought; the sugar and sack of Washington Irving, without the halfpenny-worth of bread,—without his grace and polish of pure, grammatical, careful Anglicism. . . . Another serious objection which we desire to point out to Mr. Prescott is a tendency to sneer at monarchies, courts, chivalry, and all those nobler institutions, the lack of which . . . forms the present weakness of, and will eventually decide the problem of, democracy now pending in the United States. . . . Mr. Prescott modestly expresses his sorrow at finding himself anticipated by Mr. Irving in two of the most brilliant portions of his theme, the conquest of Granada, and the history of Columbus, [see IRVING, WASHINGTON, p. 942;] and we fully enter into the natural feeling: 'pereant qui ante nos nostra dixerint.' But if he will correct certain blemishes of style, which are unworthy of his talents, amiable character, and literary perseverance, he has no cause to fear a competition with Mr. Irving. The world is wide enough for all. There is nothing new under the sun. 'Le beau est mon bien, et je le reprend où je le retrouve.' The novelty consists in the fashion, the 'callida junctura' of the workman: 'à l'œuvre on connaît l'artisan.' . . . Mr. Prescott, though heartily sympathising with the hero, [Columbus,] has throughout endeavoured to maintain the impartial spirit of a judge. . . . We must also repeat our opinion that, with all its errors and omissions of manner and matter, Mr. Prescott's is by much the first historical work which British America has as yet produced, and one that need hardly fear a comparison with any that has issued from the European press since this century begun."—June, 1839, 7, 8, 9, 10, 41, 42, 58.

In his Hand-Book for Spain, published six years later than the date of the preceding review, Mr. Ford makes many complimentary references to the History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella.

We continue our citations from British and other foreign critics.

"His excellent history of Ferdinand and Isabella."—Lon. Quar. Rev., Dec. 1843, 187.

"Mr. Prescott has long been honourably known as the author of one of the most valuable historical works produced in the present age."—Edin. Rev., April, 1845, q. v.

"Mr. Prescott has proved himself in this work to be most indefatigable. His industry has been immense. His sources of information were widely scattered. To bring them together could be no common labour. For almost every statement, sometimes to the unimportant and even trivial, he is prepared with his corroboration. He has taken nothing upon report and general credulity. He works his way through mountains of conflicting testimony. . . . The principal fault of the publication is in its deficiency of philosophical generalization."—R. W. HAMILTON: Brit. Quar. Rev., Feb. 1845, 232–276: review of 3d Lon. ed. Copied into the N.Y. Eclec. Mag., v. 145.

"The history of Spain cannot boast of a more useful and admirable contribution since the publication of the great work of Robertson."—Brit. and Foreign Rev.

"Mr. Prescott, in his excellent History of Ferdinand and Isabella," &c.—Hallam's Literary History of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 319, n.

"We cannot dismiss the book without observing that it is one of the most pleasing as well as most valuable contributions that have been made to modern history; that it is the only one that gives us a faithful and a sufficient picture of a period so momentous as the latter half of the fifteenth century."—Lon. Athen., 1838, 42–44, (by Dr. Dunham?)

"The History of Ferdinand and Isabella reads like a romance, —like one of those tales of the golden prime of Haroun al Raschid."—Lon. Times, Jan. 12, 1857.

"One of the most remarkable historical compositions that have appeared for a long time."—Bibliothèque Univ. de Genève.

"Without any disparagement to the fame of those great writers, it may be placed on the same shelf with the works of Robertson and Gibbon."—Lon. Gent. Mag., March, 1846, 227: Biog. and Crit. Miscellanies.

The critic of the Gentleman's Magazine for September, 1843, quoting from a letter from Horace Walpole to Sir Horace Mann, dated Nov. 24, 1774, (see his Letters, ed. 1861, vi. 153,) a vaticination that "The next Augustan age will dawn on the other side of the Atlantic: there will perhaps be a Thucydides at Boston, a Xenophon at New York, and, in time, a Virgil at Mexico, and a Newton at Peru, adds, in a note,

"This part of the prophecy has been verified; for Mr. Prescott's History of Ferdinand and Isabella is written in a spirit and style worthy of Xenophon, [see Prescott compared to Thucydides,—CONQUEST OF MEXICO, infra,] and may rank among the first in the English language."—245.

We know not to whom (unless to Mr. Mitford) to ascribe the verdict just cited; but the value of that which follows will not be questioned by scholars:

"The 'History of Ferdinand and Isabella' was published at the close of 1837 or the beginning of 1838; and on my arrival in Europe in the summer of 1840 I found it extensively known and duly appreciated. . . . Calling one day on the venerable Mr. Thomas Grenville, whom I found in his library, (the second in size and value of the private libraries of England,) reading Xenophon's 'Anabasis' in the original, I made some passing remark on the beauty of that work. 'Here,' said he, holding up a volume of 'Ferdinand and Isabella,' 'is one far superior.' With the exception of the Nestor of our literature, (Mr. Irving,) no American writer appeared to me so widely known or so highly esteemed in England as Mr. Prescott; and when he visited that country, a few years later, the honours paid to him by all the cultivated classes of society, from the throne downward, were such as are seldom offered to the most distinguished visitant."—EDWARD EVERETT: Proceed. of the Mass. Hist. Soc., &c., Feb. 1, 1859, 46, 49.

This it is easy to confirm. No one better understood the beatings of the literary pulse of England than the witty Canon of St. Paul's; and he expressed and compressed the enthusiasm of the habitués of Holland House, et hoc genus omne, in the quaint invitation

"When Prescott comes to England, a Caspian Sea of soup awaits him."—Memoir of Rev. Sydney Smith, i., chap. ix.

Had Mr. Smith forgotten Milton's allusion to the unfriendly demonstrations connected with the Caspian Sea? (Paradise Lost, book ii., l. 713–716.)

To the same effect is the testimony of a distinguished American statesman who visited England about eighteen months after the publication of Mr. Prescott's first work:

"Tell Mr. Prescott that I have not met a literary man that has not spoken in terms of admiration of Ferdinand and Isabella."—DANIEL WEBSTER: Letter to I. P. Davis, Lon., June 24, 1839: Webster's Priv. Corresp., ii. 152.

Such was the gratifying reception of Mr. Prescott's first literary offspring: has a familiar acquaintance of twenty years, have the rival claims of his children of maturer days, lowered this estimate?

The last commentator, and certainly one of the most competent, on Mr. Prescott's productions is the learned author of the Annals of the Artists of Spain, The Cloister-Life of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, and Velasquez and his Works,—Mr. Stirling, M.P. for Perthshire. In his interesting biographical sketch of Mr. Prescott, contributed to the Encyclopædia Britannica, 8th ed., 1859, xviii. 502–507, Mr. Stirling remarks,

"The Introduction to the History of Ferdinand and Isabella—a review of the early annals and political constitution of Castile and Aragon—is one of the most comprehensive surveys of a great subject ever presented to the historical student. The condition and relations of the crown, the nobles, the clergy, the cities, and the commons, are painted with a masterly hand, and are presented in a picture at once clear, concise, and complete. The wily, able Ferdinand and the good Isabella, the model of womanly heroism, are portrayed with consummate skill and delicacy; and neither Robertson nor Irving has excelled in easy pace the narratives of the siege of Malaga and the crowning conquest of Granada."—506.

The historical student is referred specially to the review of Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella, from the pen of Count Adolphe de Circourt, in the Bibliothèque Universelle de Genève, between July, 1838, and Jan. 1840: five articles.

"By the author's own countrymen it was received with a hearty welcome, and in England it met with almost unqualified praise from the literary organs of all parties; while in the country whose favourite monarchs it celebrates it was greeted with enthusiasm, and the author was elected a member of the Royal Academy of Madrid. Nor has its popularity been evanescent. . . . Its popularity was well merited. For the first time, the period of history when Spain rose to a leading position among the nations of Europe was fully, clearly, and vividly placed before the English reader from original and official sources; and the narrative was conducted, and events and characters were estimated, with a fairness and conscientiousness which showed itself in every page, and led the reader to rest implicitly on the good faith of the historian."—English Cyclopædia, Biog., iv., 1857, 964.

See, also, Lon. Lit. Gazette, 1854, 802.

In the opinions next to be cited it will be remembered that the unfinished History of Philip II. is not taken into consideration.

"Ferdinand and Isabella,—in my opinion his best work."—FRANCIS LIEBER, LL.D.: Letter to the author of this Dictionary, Oct. 16, 1855.

So Humboldt, it is thought, gave the preference to Ferdinand and Isabella over the author's other works,—remarking that it was "an enduring history, and could never be superseded." On the other hand, the critic of the Edinburgh Review, in his notice (April, 1845) of the History of the Conquest of Mexico,—see our quotations respecting this work, infra,—predicts greater popularity for the latter. He was not mistaken. According to the title-pages, it appears that there were published in the United States in nineteen years, (1838–56,) of Ferdinand and Isabella, eleven editions; in thirteen years, (1843–55,) of The Conquest of Mexico, twenty-three editions. In London there appear to have been published in twenty-two years, (1838–59,) of Ferdinand and Isabella, twelve editions; in seventeen years, (1843–59,) of The Conquest of Mexico, ten editions.

"By the author's countrymen," remarks an English critic just cited, "Ferdinand and Isabella was received with a hearty welcome:" the evidence of the truth of this statement has been anticipated by the figures above given; but it will be proper to cite some critical testimonies to the same effect. The first American review of Ferdinand and Isabella—a paper alive with the great personages of the times and their biographers—appeared in the North American Quarterly for January, 1838. From this valuable historical disquisition, from the pen of W. H. Gardiner, (see IRVING, WASHINGTON, p. 942, ante,) we quote the summing up of the learned judge:

"Such are the weightiest of the trifling peccadilloes in a large work, which we can point out for the author's correcting, if he shall be pleased to adopt our judgment, in some future edition. And perhaps, after such an exhibition of copious merit on the one side, and petty faults on the other, faithfully laid open according to our ability, the reader may be ready to join us in saying—on such works we are content to rest the literary reputation of the country."—291.

We quote some other American opinions;

"In every page we have been reminded of that untiring patience and careful discrimination which have given celebrity to the great, though not always impartial, historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire."—JOHN PICKERING: Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella: New York Review, April, 1838, 308.

"As the period which Mr. Prescott selected was that in which the modern system of Europe may be said to have taken its rise, and was in an especial degree encumbered with falsehood and sophistry, it was a subject which seemed at once to tempt the historian by its importance and repel him by its difficulties. The History of Ferdinand and Isabella shows that Mr. Prescott thoroughly comprehended the revolution to which we have referred; and his exposition of it is admirable. His work accurately reflects the spirit of the age and the character of its prominent actors; and we have been especially struck with his felicity in developing character, not in an isolated analysis of qualities, but in the narration of the events which called them forth. He so blends character with events that their mutual relation is distinctly seen."—E. P. WHIPPLE: Prescott's Histories: Method. Quar. Rev., Jan. 1848; and in his Essays and Reviews, 1852, ii. 173.

"It has taken the rank of a classic in our language, and in the emulous favour with which it has been received on each side of the Atlantic may be read an assurance of the unbiassed judgment of posterity."—GEO. S. HILLARD: N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1844, 158; Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico.

"We cannot but timidly flatter ourselves that, one day or another, our American aspirants for literary honours will get more into the way of spending some time in sowing and reaping their laurels, preparatory to tuning their voices for the Harvest Home. A very few examples, at all like the recent one of Mr. Prescott's brilliant success, cannot fail of producing a decided effect of this kind; and whoever, by showing what a mind of high endowments owes to itself, and what it may achieve if it have but fair play, disposes our young scholars to be content to wait for applause till they have taken time to deserve it, has done a service to his country worthy of all grateful commemoration."—J. G. PALFREY: Hillhouse's Poems and Discourses: N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1840, 232.

"The 'History of Ferdinand and Isabella' is a work that unites the fascination of romantic fiction with the grave interest of authentic events. Its author makes no pretension to analytical power, except in the arrangement of his materials; he is content to describe, and his talents are more artistic than philosophical; neither is any established theory or principle obvious; his ambition is apparently limited to skilful narration. Indefatigable in research, sagacious in the choice and comparison of authorities, serene in temper, graceful in style, and pleasing in sentiment, he possesses all the requisites for an agreeable writer; while his subjects have yielded so much of picturesque material and romantic interest as to atone for the lack of any more original or brilliant qualities in the author."—H. T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit., 1852.

"Hardly nine years have passed since the publication of the History of Ferdinand and Isabella placed Mr. Prescott at once, by universal consent both in England and America, in the front of English historians. And what a golden account he has rendered of his labours during the brief period!"—FRANCIS BOWEN: Prescott's Conquest of Peru: N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1847, 366.

This "golden account" we must now proceed to examine,—first, however, referring the reader to A Review of that portion of Prescott's "Ferdinand and Isabella" where a parallel is drawn between Elizabeth of England and Isabella of Spain; with a Review of Campbell's Lects. on Poetry, (from New Month. Mag.,) both by Mrs. Elizabeth Sanders, Bost., 1841, 12mo; Chris. Exam., (March, 1838,) xxiv. 99, (by F. W. Greenwood;) Democrat Rev., (May, 1838,) ii. 160, (by George Bancroft;) Phila. Museum, xxxvi. 451; Lieber's Polit. Ethics; Ticknor's Hist. of Span. Lit., 188, n., 189, n., 563, n.; Everett's Orations and Speeches, iii. 198; Irving's Chronicles of the Conquest of Granada, Pref., xviii., Works, ed. 1848–50; Von Hefele's Life of Ximenes; Circourt's Hist. des Arabes en Espagne; FOX, CHARLES JAMES; GEORGE, ANITA, MRS.; IRVING, WASHINGTON, pp. 940, 941, 942, 943, 944. The student will also feel some interest in Ubertino Carrara's Latin epic, Columbus, (noticed on p. 941, supra.) Nor should we omit to notice that Mr. Joseph Russell has published within the last few years (Lon., 1851: see Lon. Athen., 1852, 17) a translation into English, from the Spanish of Don Manuel José Quintana, of the Memoirs of Gonsalvo Hernandez de Cordova, styled the Great Captain.

2. HISTORY OF THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO, WITH A PRELIMINARY VIEW OF THE ANCIENT MEXICAN CIVILIZATION, AND THE LIFE OF THE CONQUEROR, HERNANDO CORTEZ, N. York, Harper & Brothers, 1843, 3 vols. 8vo. Nearly 7000 copies sold the first year. Last ed., Phila., J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1868, 3 vols. 8vo. Repub. in English in France and Germany. Lon., (Bentley,) 1843, 3 vols. 8vo. Col. Aspinwall sold the copyright to Mr. Bentley for £650. 10th London ed., (Routledge, W. & R.,) 1859, viz.: I., Lib. ed., 2 vols. demy 8vo, steel plates, 21*s.*; II., Cab. ed., 3 vols. p. 8vo, steel plates, 12*s.*; III., 1 vol. ed.,

cr. 8vo, 5s.; IV., Cheap ed., 2 vols. fp. 8vo, bds. 4s., cl. 5s.; adv. to 5s., 1861. Copies printed in the United States and London to Jan. 1, 1860, 20,616. This work is founded upon about eight thousand folio pages of unpublished documents, duplicates of MSS. in the collections of Don Juan Baptista Muñoz and Señor Vargas Ponce, (both in the archives of the Royal Academy of History at Madrid,) and in the library of Don Martin Fernandez de Navarrete, other original authorities, and such printed works on the subjects discussed as had previously been given to the world. The work was reviewed at length (pp. 187–235) in the London Quarterly, vol. lxxiii., Dec. 1843, by Dean H. H. Milman. We can quote but a few lines:

"Mr. Prescott possesses high qualifications, and some peculiar advantages, for the execution of such a work. . . . In his disquisitions on the political state and the civilization of the Aztec kingdoms, he is full and copious, without being prolix and wearisome; his narrative is flowing and spirited, sometimes very picturesque; his style has dropped the few Americanisms which still jarred on our fastidious ear in his former work, and is, in general, pure and sound English. Above all, his judgments are unaffectedly candid and impartial. . . . We conclude with expressing our satisfaction that Mr. Prescott has given us an opportunity at this time of showing our deep sympathy, the sympathy of kindred and of blood, with Americans who, like himself, do honour to our common literature. Mr. Prescott may take his place among the really good English writers of history in modern times, and will be received, we are persuaded, into that small community with every feeling of friendly and fraternal respect."—188, 235. This review was copied into the Boston Living Age, i. 10–32.

"Mr. Prescott appears to us to possess almost every qualification for his task. He has a pure, simple, and eloquent style—a keen relish for the picturesque—a quick and discerning judgment of character—and a calm, generous, and enlightened spirit of philanthropy. There is no exaggeration in asserting that his 'Conquest of Mexico' combines—some allowance, where that is necessary, being made for the inferior extent and importance of its subject—most of the valuable qualities which distinguish the most popular historical writers in our language of the present day. It unites the chivalrous but truthful enthusiasm of Colonel Napier, and the vivacity of the accomplished author of the 'Siege of Granada,' with the patient and ample research of Mr. Tytler. . . . It would be easy to fill our pages with sparkling quotations, with sketches of scenery worthy of Scott, with battle-pieces rivalling those of Napier, with pictures of disaster and desolation scarcely less pathetic than those drawn by Thucydides. But Mr. Prescott has, no doubt, too much taste not to accept it as a compliment, when we say that every reader of intelligence forgets the beauty of his colouring in the grandeur of his outline, and that nothing but a connected sketch of the latter can do justice to the highest charm of his work. The 'Conquest of Mexico' is probably of less importance as a collection of facts, and of less merit as an intellectual effort, than the 'History of Ferdinand and Isabella,' but we think it even more secure of universal popularity."—Edin. Rev., April, 1845, lxxxi. 434–473: Prescott's Conquest of Mexico, (by Charles Philipps.)

The perusal of this paper gratified Mr. Prescott.

"We are embarrassed by the copiousness of the subject, and the exuberant richness of the successive pictures, and the variety of subjects it comprehends. . . . Even the first volume is so comprehensive in its views as to afford at once a description of the natural features, the climate and productions of the country, and of the various and remote migrations of the people; a history of their government, laws, and revenue; of their political state, their military institutions, and their religious belief and worship; of the arts of life and the degree to which they had attained; and of the domestic manners and habits; as well as of the discovery of the country by its future conqueror. . . . Mr. Prescott has also given us a valuable essay on that difficult and controverted subject, the origin of Mexican civilization, as connected with the magnificent ruins and architectural antiquities of Central America, discovered by Mr. Stephens, and with the remains of Palenque and Uxmal described by Dupaix and Waldeck."—Lon. Gent. Mag., Oct. 1844, 339–359: Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico.

See, also, Gent. Mag., March, 1846, 227, where Prescott is placed before Robertson.

"The History of the Conquest of Mexico, by Mr. Prescott, a work still fresh in the recollection of our readers, served greatly to increase that reputation as an historian which he had acquired by his Ferdinand and Isabella. The subject was happily chosen by him."—Lon. Gent. Mag., July, 1847, 3–5: Prescott's History of the Conquest of Peru.

"We rejoice to see Mr. Prescott again in the field. . . . The more closely we examine Mr. Prescott's work, the more do we find cause to commend his diligent research, as well as his care and candour in comparing together his numerous and oftentimes conflicting authorities. His vivacity of manner, and discursive observations scattered through notes as well as text, furnish countless proofs of his matchless industry. In point of style, too, he ranks with the ablest English historians; and paragraphs may be found in his volumes in which the grace and elegance of Addison are combined with Robertson's majestic cadence and Gibbon's brilliancy."—Lon. Athen., 1843, 973–974, 1005–1007: Hist. of the Conquest of Mexico.

"Miss Edgeworth has asserted that this is the best historical work published during the present century; she might have added, the best work ever published on the subject."—Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, ii., 1846, 376.

"It is a noble work; judiciously planned and admirably executed; rich with the spoils of learning easily and gracefully worn; imbued everywhere with a conscientious love of the truth, and controlled by that unerring good sense without which genius leads astray with its false lights, and learning encumbers with its heavy panoply. It will win the literary voluptuary to its pages by the attractiveness of its subject and the flowing ease of its style; and the historical student will do honour to the extent and variety of the research which it displays, and to the thoroughness with which its investigations have been conducted. We can confidently predict for it an extensive and permanent popularity. . . . It will take its place among those enduring productions of the human mind which age cannot stale and custom cannot wither."—GEORGE S. HILLARD: N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1844, lviii. 157–210: Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico.

"The result of all his labours, of research, thought, and composition, was a history possessing the unity, variety, and interest of a magnificent poem. It deals with a series of facts, and exhibits a gallery of characters, which to have invented would place its creator by the side of Homer; and which to realize and represent in the mode Mr. Prescott has done, required a rare degree of historical imagination."—E. Une partie de ces documents n'existe plus, et le reste a passé dans différentes mains."

See, also, Prescott's Mexico, Index. Mr. Trübner, of London, well known both as a scholar and publisher, (we venture to style him the successor of Mr. O. Rich,) published in 1860, in one volume octavo, Mapoteca Colombiano: Coleccion de los Títulos de todos los Mapas, Planos, Vistas, etc., relativos á la America Española, Brazil, é Islas Adyacentes; por el Dr. Ezequiel Uricoechea de Bogotà, Nueva Granada. We also refer the reader to the Bibliographical Prolegomena prefixed to Mr. Trübner's excellent Bibliographical Guide to American Literature, (Lon., 1857, 8vo, pp. cxlix. 554,) especially to the careful collation of Beristain's important work (containing 3687 literary notices, both biographical and bibliographical) on the progress of Literature and Science in Mexico and the adjacent countries. Another work also claims our notice. Within the last few months, and since Mr. Prescott's death, has been published A New History of the Conquest of Mexico, by Robert Anderson Wilson, Counsellor-at-Law, Author of Mexico and its Religion, &c., Phila., 1859, 8vo, pp. 539.

"We venture to say," remarks the (New York) Knickerbocker, "that had this book been published thirty years ago, Mr. Prescott would never have written of the Mexican Conquest as he did; and whoever writes or reads of it hereafter must take the facts which Mr. Wilson proves into his account."

"The apparent consequences are," says the Methodist Quarterly Review, "that some splendid fictions must disappear from the story of our continent, and some of the most valued volumes—not only of Robertson, but of Prescott—must leave the department of history, and take their position in the domains of romance."

"We are not yet prepared to criticise this book," remarks the North American Review, April, 1859, 576, "unless we adopt Sydney Smith's doctrine and regard ourselves as specially qualified to review it by not having read it. But we have read enough to see that it is a work of no ordinary ability, research, boldness, and vigour. Mr. Wilson has collected in Mexico all the materials there accessible for his use, and especially has examined the alleged monuments of Aztec civilization, which dwindle on a near approach. He pronounces Bernal Diaz a myth, and, of course, his so-called personal narrative a collection of myths. With all the fervour of an iconoclast, he deals destruction among historical traditions till now undoubted. We are not yet prepared to believe that his reading of this portion of American history will take its place as genuine; but we reserve our opinion till we have a right to form it."

Several other anonymous commendatory notices of the work will be found in the American Publishers' Circular, May 7, 1859, 225. See, also, Amer. Theolog. Rev., May, 1859, 387; Lon. Athen., 1859, ii. 270. On the other hand, three eminent authorities, Mr. John Foster Kirk, late secretary to Mr. Prescott, (see Philip II., i., Pref., xvi.,) Mr. George Ticknor, the author of the History of Spanish Literature, and Mr. E. G. Squier, the author of Travels in Central America and other learned antiquarian works, unite in condemning Mr. Wilson's volume as unworthy of the least degree of consideration. Mr. Kirk's comments will be found in the Atlantic Monthly Magazine for April and May, 1859; Mr. Ticknor's, in the Boston Courier for May 7, 1859, (see, also, Proceed. Mass. Hist. Soc., 1858–60, 277, and 1860–62, 101;) Mr. Squier's, in a letter to the New York Tribune, dated April 30, 1859, and in a letter to the author of this Dictionary, dated May 13, 1859.

Mr. Ticknor, after strengthening the evidence of the existence of Bernal Diaz by the adduction of the testimony (given since the appearance of Mr. Wilson's book) of the Abbé de Bourbourg, concludes,

"This is certainly pretty well for 'a myth.' But to be serious. An author like Mr. Wilson, who makes the boldest assertions, and then is obliged to run for luck in order to find evidence that he may hope will support them,—who has so little fairness or judgment as is shown by his treatment of Dr. Robertson, and so little knowledge or spirit of inquiry as he has shown in the case of Bernal Diaz,—can really have no claim to the character of an historian. Still less has he a right to speak in any tone except one of perfect deference, when he mentions such names as those of Baron Humboldt and Mr. Prescott."

Mr. Squier remarks, (we quote a few lines from his letter of May 13, 1859, supra,)

"The work of Mr. Wilson in no degree justifies its title, still less its pretensions. It does not add a single new fact to our stock of knowledge on the subject to which it relates; and it is throughout characterised by dogmatism, presumption, and ignorance, rendered doubly offensive by a crude, inflated, and conceited style. . . . Mr. Wilson has not only proved himself in every essential respect incompetent for the undertaking, but has brought discredit, if not contempt, on American scholarship, so far as he may be supposed to be an exponent of its character."

Another unfavourable review of Wilson's Conquest of Mexico, nearly four columns in length, by Mr. J. W. Dwinelle, of Rochester, New York, was published in the New York Tribune of April 12, 1859. We quote the concluding lines:

"We will not follow Mr. Wilson to the 'Lake of Mexico,' where his facts refute his argument. We have not examined his personal statements: after the ill fortune we have had with his citations and engravings, that task would be beyond our capacity.

"But we are compelled to say that, having gone over much of the ground to which the researches of Mr. Prescott pointed the way, we have found his statements in every instance borne out by his citations; we have never found him suppressing, never mutilating, a material fact; and never in those authors who are not cited by him have we found an important fact which is not included in the completeness of his generalizations. Such was the conscientious integrity of a historian who considered the suppression of truth the same as a wilful falsehood; such his exhaustive research, which permitted no important fact to escape him; such his modesty, which refused to encumber his pages with a merely cumulative erudition."

Copies printed in the United States and England to Jan. 1, 1860, 16,965.

In the preparation of this work Mr. Prescott used a portion of the MSS. collections referred to in our notice of the Conquest of Mexico, (supra,) a part of the unpublished documents formerly in the possession of Lord Kingsborough, and other original materials, collected at great expense in England and on the continent.

"Mr. Prescott's style and manner of composition are adapted with singular felicity to this half-poetic history. His strong imaginative faculty, heightened by the peculiarity of his situation, (of which more presently,) delights in the rich and the marvellous, both in nature and in human action; he has acquired a skill of arrangement and grouping of characters and events which attest long and patient study of the highest models; while the calmer moral and Christian tone of his judgments by no means deadens his sympathies with the fiercer and more barbarous heroism of ancient days. His narrative presents in general, though not without some exceptions, a happy combination of modern historic philosophy with something of the life and picturesqueness of an ancient chronicle."—Lon. Quar. Review, Sept. 1847, 317–344: Prescott's Conquest of Peru. Copied into Bost. Liv. Age, xv. 495–507.

"Already favourably known by his histories of the eventful and chivalrous reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, and of the exploits of the Great Marquis and his iron followers, Mr. Prescott has added to his well-merited reputation by his narrative of the Conquest of Peru. . . . The last of these works, of which Pizarro is the hero and Peru the scene, yields nothing in merit or interest to its predecessors."—Blackwood's Mag., July, 1847, 1–20: Prescott's Peru. Copied into Bost. Liv. Age, xiv. 289–300.

"Who that has read any thing has left unread those charming histories of Mr. Prescott, The Conquest of Mexico and The Conquest of Peru? A philosopher pursuing his speculations upon humanity can nowhere find richer materials for the construction of his theories than in those volumes. A youth craving the excitement of imagination can nowhere enter into more wondrous regions of poetry and romance."—Blackwood's Mag., April, 1856, 421: Prescott's Philip II., (vols. i., ii.)

"The work is so alluring in its subject, so pleasing in its execution, and so moderate in its extent, as would never fatigue the attention or make any undue demands on the time. . . . We do not hold out Mr. Prescott's style as one that is, to our taste, without faults. In his descriptive parts we think it too exuberant, too much abounding in epithet, erring on the side of too great fulness. It is a great fault in a writer to pour out all his stores without reserve, to leave nothing to the reader to supply, no spot unoccupied which he can appropriate, no touch which he can add; and we think that this graceful and judicious reserve of power is a very distinguishing feature in the style of Robertson."—Lon. Gent. Mag., July, 1847, 3–22: Prescott's History of the Conquest of Peru.

"In some respects the work before us is more interesting than 'The Conquest of Mexico,' by which it was preceded."—Lon. Athen., 1847, 541. See, also, 568, 1194.

"Description in some sort is Mr. Prescott's first excellence; but he does not fail in philosophy; marking with a free and judicious spirit the crimes of his heroes, and their excuses, though perhaps, like Robertson, he allows the courage and capacity of the Spaniards to shade his vision as to their evil deeds. It is possible that he echoes a common error in grounding too much of their defence upon the spirit of the age."—Lon. Spectator. Copied into Bost. Liv. Age, xiv. 120–123.

"In delineation of the character of the hero of the conquest, it seems to us that great judgment is shown. Neither the lights nor the shades are too broadly or deeply drawn. What allied him to Cortez and what widely separates them, in his patient endurance, his incredible perseverance, his freedom from bigotry, his insatiable avarice, his reckless perfidy, and his indomitable cruelty, is patiently and well set forth. We have neither a perfect hero nor an absolute monster, but undoubtedly a most extraordinary man."—Lon. Examiner. Copied into Bost. Liv. Age, xiv. 176–180.

"This work has probably been the most extensively popular of Mr. Prescott's histories, though the subject would not seem to admit so many elements of interest as the others. . . . In the 'Conquest of Peru' his characteristic merits are displayed in their best aspect, exhibiting the effects of time and experience in giving more intensity to his conceptions and more certainty to his language. Accordingly, we have not here to chronicle a decay of power, but its freer and more vigorous expression."—E. P. Whipple: Method. Quar. Rev., April, 1848: (Prescott's Conquest of Peru:) and in his Essays and Reviews, ii. 187–208.

"Brille pour les qualités ordinaires de l'auteur, la connaissance approfondie des sources, une description pittoresque et une chaleur d'âme qui ne se concilie pas toujours avec l'impartialité."—Dict. Universel des Contemporains, par G. Vapereau, Paris, 1858, 1408: art. Prescott.

But we feel unwilling to proceed to our next heading without quoting a few lines from the eloquent pen of the author of the Cloister-Life of the Emperor Charles V.:

"In the Conquest of Mexico and the Conquest of Peru," remarks Mr. Stirling, (Encyc. Brit., ut supra,) "and especially in the chapters on the civilization of the Aztecs and the Incas, Mr. Prescott displays great sagacity in assorting the scattered fragments of social edifices, which were destroyed before they could be intelligently delineated, and in recalling to their living forms the dry bones of the extinct races which inhabited them. He also appears to have shaken off the diffidence of a stranger in the historical field. His style betokens more self-confidence, and is bolder and more animated. His descriptions of scenery, in which he is always happy and never redundant, are more full and vivid, and are elaborated with the greater care which was required by the strangeness of unfamiliar lands. Mexico spreads her matchless valley, her lake, and her imperial city before our eyes; we wander through the royal gardens, beneath the giant cedars, of Tezcuco; the golden halls of the Inca and the blazing temples of the sun unfold themselves before us; we follow the silver-shod cavalry of Pizarro through the flowery dales of the Cordilleras; or we ascend through the pastures of the llama or the stern regions where the condor hovers in the tropical sun around the peaks of the Andes. The account of the triste noche, the rueful night in which, after the death of Montezuma, Cortez and his band retreated across the lake and along the broken causeway, cutting their way through a nation in arms, is one of the finest pictures of modern historical painting."—506–07.

The student will find something to interest him in the following works on Peru: The Discoverie and Conqvest of the Prouinces of Perv, &c., Lon., 1581, 4to; A Voyage to Peru in 1745, '46, '48, '49, 1753, 12mo; Peruvian Tales, 3d ed., 1750, 3 vols. 12mo; Peruvian Letters, 1774, 2 vols. 12mo; Present State of Peru, by J. 4. History of the Reign of Philip the Second, King of Spain: vols. i. and ii., 8vo, Bost., Phillips, Sampson & Co., Dec. 1855; last ed., Phila., J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1868; London, Bentley, 1855: I., Lib. ed., 2 vols. 8vo, steel plates, 28*s.*; II., Cab. ed., 2 vols. cr. 8vo, steel plates, 12*s.*; III., Cheap ed., 1 vol. p. 8vo, 5*s.*; 4th Lon. ed., 1859. See under vol. iii., infra. Announced in Russ in Russia early in 1858. Copies of vols. i. and ii. printed in the United States and England to Jan. 1, 1860, 13,000.

In the preparation of these volumes Mr. Prescott is said to have employed six years. A letter written by him from Brussels in the summer of 1850 (see Philip II., i. 342, n.) will show the enthusiasm with which he entered into the spirit of the age of Charles the Fifth, and will probably remind the reader of the "musings" of the historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire "amidst the ruins of the Capitol, while the barefooted friars were singing vespers in the Temple of Jupiter."

Vols. i. and ii. bring down the story to the execution of Counts Egmont and Hoorn, in 1568, and to the imprisonment and death of Don Carlos. In the collection of materials for this history Mr. Prescott spared neither time, cost, personal labour, nor the services of willing friends. Public and private collections were freely opened to his use, and the long-closed doors of the ancient Archives of Simancas, (respecting which, see Lon. Athenæum, 1860, ii. 593, 910; 1861, i. 51; 1862, ii. 653, and Lon. Gent. Mag., 1857, ii. 152,) and of other secret repositories, flew open at the name of the magician whose potent genius had reanimated the glories of the Old World and depicted with a vivid pencil the sorrows and desolation of the New. Notices of the valuable mass of unpublished materials thus collected will be found in the Preface to Philip II., and in Mr. Edward Everett's Remarks before the Massachusetts Historical Society,—Proceedings, &c., Feb. 1 1859, 47–49.

Some time before the publication of the first and second volumes of Philip the Second, Mr. Ticknor, after a gorgeous exhibition of the "goodly stones" and brilliant gems of which the great architect was to construct his noble edifice, remarks,

"These grand materials, thus grouped together, constitute a subject for history which the great masters of ancient or of modern times might well envy to Mr. Prescott. That it will—even more than any thing he has yet done—insure him a place by their side, we do not doubt."—Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit., 1855, ii. 237.

The prospect would indeed have appalled one less confident in his own resources, less conscious of greater strength than had yet been developed by past exertions. Under Mr. Prescott's infirmity, a task requiring such minute scrutiny and unwearied application ("day-labour, light denied") was—or would have been to other men—most discouraging. But Mr. Ticknor—for he knew the builder as well as the difficulties of his enterprise—was fully justified in his prediction: there were no lamentations over the diminished glories of a later temple. The muse of Dryden, eloquent in deploring the proofs of intellectual decadence, would have sought in vain for inspiration in a comparison of the earlier and the last fruits of the genius of the historian.

The first instalment of Philip the Second was received with enthusiasm in all countries:

"The great historian of the New World," writes Humboldt to a German correspondent, "who has scarcely a rival in the Old one, the excellent Prescott, has rejoiced us with a new book."

From M. Guizot's review of the volumes, in the Edinburgh Review for January, 1857, we have already quoted, (Motley, John Lothrop, p. 1379,) and recommend the reader to peruse the whole paper. A few lines must be extracted in this place, as an amusing instance of differences of opinion between great critics, or—if M. Guizot be correct in his analysis—of a great change in the literary characteristics of the historian. One of the most prominent features of Mr. Prescott's style, in the opinion of many readers, is the accuracy, brilliancy, and general felicity of his descriptions. For more than any thing else, perhaps, he has been blamed for occasional want of simplicity in language. But hear M. Guizot on these points:

"To this merit of a well-arranged history Mr. Prescott adds that of an easy, unaffected, though somewhat frigid, power of narration. He belongs to the historical school of Robertson, judicious rather than profound in its general views, and more remarkable for simplicity than for descriptive power. The pictures Mr. Prescott has given us are never wanting in truth, but they are sometimes wanting in life. History only becomes dramatic on two conditions: it must have either the passion of the politician or the imagination of the poet. Mr. Prescott has neither the one nor the other; he is a calm and enlightened philosopher, an accomplished man of letters; he is well read in the history of Philip II., and he relates it with fidelity; but he has studied it after the lapse of three centuries in all the serenity of his own reflections and the tranquillity of a New England study: faithfully, therefore, as these events and these personages are described by him, he leaves them where he finds them, —in their tombs."

Compare this dictum with that of the critic of the London Athenæum, Nov. 3, 1855, infra. We continue our citations:

"This story of that terrible collision of passions . . . is described by Mr. Prescott in language not of partisanship, scarcely with human indignation or human sympathy, but in 'the still sad music' of wise melancholy. We are taken into the sixteenth century as among men whose faults are buried in their tombs. The age lies spread out before us as if it were a church-yard in moonlight, yet without the shadows which make the forms of moonlight fearful; we walk among the realms of the dead, loving those to whom love is due,—feeling for those whom in life we should most have hated, only the sorrowing pity with which we should read their names upon their sepulchres.

"This is all which we can say now. The best judgment which Mr. Prescott can receive upon his work will be the deserved admiration of America and England."—Westminster Review, Jan. 1856.

"Of Mr. Prescott's book we have already spoken. Like all his writings, it is elegant, rational, cultivated, written in a kindly, genial spirit, dispassionate and tolerant."—Westminster Review, April, 1856: Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic.

"If, therefore, the reader of the present volumes, recalling to mind the fascination of those [Mr. Prescott's] previous works, should feel somewhat disappointed in the Reign of Philip II., let him reflect for a moment on the different nature of the subject which was here to engage the labours of the historian. . . . We shall look with interest for the remaining portion of Mr. Prescott's work."—Blackw. Mag., April, 1856: Prescott's Philip II.

"We are gratified to find that Mr. Prescott has undertaken this important history. No one can be better qualified for the task than himself, both from his previous knowledge of the history of Spain, and his command of hitherto unemployed materials, but more than all his skill and judgment in using them. . . . We close these volumes with much pleasure, hoping soon to receive the remaining portion of this valuable history; meanwhile recommending them to all our readers as a most carefully studied and graphic narrative of those eventful times."—Brit. Quar. Rev., Feb. 1856. Copied into Boston Living Age, xlviii. 449–468.

Both this critic and M. Guizot (ubi supra) complain that Mr. Prescott has devoted too many pages to the siege of Malta. "He has evidently been led away by the charm of his subject," remarks the latter; "graphically and powerfully is it told by Mr. Prescott," is the verdict of the former.

"In addition to its substantial value as a contribution to the political, religious, and social annals of Europe, it derives some of its most admirable qualities from the peculiar genius of its author. In a warmly-coloured style—clear, flexible, and full of variety—Mr. Prescott narrates the incidents of Philip's reign. His story moves swiftly, but is nowhere incomplete. The personages are well grouped; the order of circumstances and the order of time are well reconciled; the events are neither confused nor isolated. The book is at once pictorial and sober, critical and dramatic. . . . The historian has surmounted with singular art the obvious difficulties of his subject. . . . Tracing the origin and cause of these political, religious, and military events, Mr. Prescott fills his canvas with accessary details,—with delicately tinted pictures of social life,—with grand architectural perspectives,—with pageants described in language which reflects the gorgeous varieties of Burgundian pomp and splendour. . . . When complete, it will rank justly with Mr. Prescott's former works, which have taken permanent place in all historical libraries."—Lon. Athenæum, Nov. 3, 1855, 1263–1265. Copied into the Boston Liv. Age, xlviii. 27–32.

The same periodical, (Athen., March 1, 1856, 261,) in a review of Mr. Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic, remarks,

"The work seems to have been composed and printed before Mr. Prescott published the commencement of his 'Life of Philip the Second;' otherwise the admirable pictures and the equally admirable criticisms of Mr. Prescott would not, in all probability, have been slighted by Mr. Motley, who traverses much of the same ground and appeals to many of the same authorities."

"The story of Philip contains as much graphic matter, colours as bright, anecdotes as pleasant, criticism as sound, historical views as broad and luminous, as the story of Ferdinand and Isabella. It is the book to sustain a reputation,—and to increase it."—Lon. Reader, Nov. 1855.

"What historical reader does not know how much of the colour and fulness of life Mr. Prescott can throw into a narrative that is nevertheless succinct and rapid, its salient features admirably grouped and its matter well condensed? We need only assure every such reader that these new volumes are entirely worthy of a place beside their predecessors, that they fulfil the expectation of the public, and perfectly maintain—for in this way they could scarcely exalt—the author's reputation."—Lon. Examiner, Nov. 1855.

"Mr. Prescott was again to achieve great and unquestionable success. Of the importance of the addition which this work has made to English historical literature there is but one opinion. The excellences of the author's previous works are all here,—the picturesque narrative, the lucid style, the generous yet judicial spirit, the thorough digestion and scrupulous sifting of the materials,—often not only contradictory in themselves, but embarrassing in their richness,—and, above and pervading all, the thorough integrity of purpose, the earnest and untiring pursuit and ever-present love of truth, which, amid his many admirable qualities, is that which is perhaps his prime characteristic as a historian."—English Cyclopædia, Biog., iv., 1857, 964. See, also, 792, (Philip II.)

In Italy, the arrival of the first and second volumes of Philip was announced by the Revista Contemporanea of Turin, and the work, so far as completed, is declared to be "a monument of thorough study and research, worthy of the author's fame. The style is clear, flexible, and dignified, at the same time picturesque and severe, critical and dramatic. This celebrated American, born in Massachusetts the year 1796, is also a connoisseur in our literature, and among his essays are two on Italian poetry, first published in the North American Review. We hope to be able hereafter to announce an Italian translation of his Philip II., as we announce to-day the publication at Florence of a Compendium of the History of Peru before the Spanish Conquest, derived from Mr. Prescott's work, [Madrid edition, 1851.]"

"The author's task was arduous in the highest degree. . . . Suffice it to say, for the present, that the difficulty of the achievement is but the measure of the genius and industry manifested in its successful accomplishment, and that expectations founded on the author's previous works are, if possible, more than realized in this."—A. P. Peabody, D.D.: N. Amer. Rev., April, 1856: Critical Notices, 10.

"Of the merits of this particular work we have only to say that they equal those of its predecessors. The style is, if any thing, more easy and fluent, and all the parts show the same thorough preparation and uniform polish and finish. . . . The chapters on the Knights Hospitallers of St. John and the siege of Malta are particularly interesting, and, like many other portions of those volumes, will undoubtedly always be ranked among the finest passages of modern history."—C. W. Upham: N. Amer. Review, July, 1856, 96–103: Prescott as an Historian.

"Among the thousand readers of the graceful pages in which Prescott has told a portion of the tale of Philip II., are there not some who will give a minute's thought to that other Peninsular nation which Philip with difficulty subdued?"—T. Philip the Second, 8vo, vol. iii., Boston, Phillips, Sampson & Co., Dec. 1858; last ed., Phila., J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1868; London, (Routledge, W. & R.,) 1858: I., Lib. ed., 8vo; II., Cab. ed., p. 8vo, 5*s.*; III., Cheap ed., bds. 2*s.*, cl. 2*s.* 6*d.*; vols. i., ii., (4th ed. of these, 1859,) and iii. are issued (Routledge, R. & W., 1859) as follows: I., Lib. ed., 3 vols. demy 8vo, steel plates, 42*s.*; II., Cab. ed., 3 vols. p. 8vo, steel plates, 15*s.*; III., 2 vols. cr. 8vo, 10*s.*; IV., Cheap ed., 3 vols. fp. 8vo, bds. 6*s.*, cl. 7*s.* 6*d.* The same house also issued Mr. Prescott's four histories, —Ferdinand and Isabella, Mexico, Peru, Philip II., vols. i., ii., iii.,—all in 22 one-shilling parts. Copies of vol. iii. printed in the United States and England to Jan. 1, 1860, 8000.

This is indeed cheap for such ware; and, as much has been said both respecting the failure of Mr. Prescott to obtain copyright-money for Philip the Second and the extent to which he intended to carry that noble history, we are disposed to give some authentic information on these subjects, extracted from letters of Mr. Prescott to the writer,—the author of this Dictionary. Under date of February 27, 1857, Mr. Prescott remarks,

"The query you put to me as to the time which will be occupied by me in completing the history of Philip II., I believe Œdipus himself could not answer. If I had good eyes and health, I might certainly accomplish it in half a dozen years, allowing three volumes for the remainder of the work, [i.e. five in all.] But my labours have been much interrupted of late by the state of my health; and I fear I cannot count upon such progress. The work may extend to six volumes. I had a contract with my London publisher, limiting me to that number, for which I was to receive from him £1000 a volume,—when the decision in the House of Lords that foreigners are not entitled to copyright, left me at liberty to write as many volumes and with as little profit as I please. Here I have made no contract as to the number, which I think, however, should not exceed five."

To the above may be added that two houses each offered Mr. Prescott £1000 per volume for Philip the Second.

In answer to a hint elicited by the letter just quoted, Mr. Prescott thus wrote us, March 7, 1857:

"I am much obliged to you for the hint you have given me in your note of the 4th inst., respecting English copyright. My publisher was so well satisfied that a good one could be obtained in the way you suggest, that he made me very liberal offers if I would go to London and stay there during the printing and publication of Philip the Second. But I loved the sea too little, and my home too well, to accept his proposals."

See, also, R. C. Weld's Vacation Tour, 1855, 8vo; Stirling's Memoir of Prescott, in Encyc. Brit., 8th ed., xviii. 505. We observe that Mr. Stirling remarks that Mr. Prescott's income from his writings "has been estimated at from £4000 to £5000 a year." The aggregate sale of his four histories and the volume of Miscellanies to Jan. 1, 1860, has been 195,971 volumes. The third volume of Philip II. (embracing the period 1566 to 1574) is mainly occupied by the revolt of the Moors, the battle of Lepanto, and the building of the Escurial. Lord Macaulay, in a letter to a Boston correspondent, commended this volume in the highest terms, and expressed the opinion that, with the exception of a few chapters of some of the author's previous works, his last production was his best. In this opinion he is not singular:

"The genius of Mr. Prescott as a historian"—it is the verdict of the intelligent critic of the London Athenæum, Dec. 18, 1858—"has never been exhibited to better advantage than in this very remarkable volume, which is grounded on varied and ample authority. . . . His fifth book, to borrow a phrase from foreign criticism, marches like a cavalry squadron: it is swift, animated, glittering; it is radiant, pictorial, and flushed, as though the writer were exulting in his amplitude of materials and perfect mastery of details. Taken alone, it would appreciably enhance the literary reputation of Mr. Prescott. The style throughout runs on a high level, but is free from all artificial pomp and rhetorical redundance. It is at once simple, firm, and dignified."—791, 793.

The London Critic tells us that the events chronicled in the third volume

"are episodes partly of such historical and biographical significance, partly so effluent with picturesque material, and they are altogether recorded by Mr. Prescott with such ability and animation, that the reader never feels a sensation of tedium, or that his patience is being trifled with. . . . As a work of art, the volume is complete in itself. . . . We take leave of Mr. Prescott's admirable volume with a renewed sense of the obligations which history owes him. The present volume alone would establish his claims to a high rank among contemporary historians."

"Prescott's last volume was finished after he was sixty; and it is a perfect model of skill in narration. Every statement is the result of most elaborate research; and yet, as he passes from court to country, from valley to mountain-ranges, from Spain to the Levant, among Moors, and Turks, and Christians, and corsairs from Barbary, his movements are as easy and graceful as those of the humming-bird as it dives after honey among the flowers of summer, and his pictures of battles are as vivid as though the sun had taken them in its brightest colours at the very moment they were raging."—GEORGE BANCROFT: Address before the N. York Histor. Soc'y: Prescott Memorial, 1859, xiii.

"The new volume is more vivid in colour and dramatic in incident than either of its predecessors. . . . What Spaniard has portrayed the Life and Times of Philip II. more successfully than our own Prescott?"—HENRY T. TUCKERMAN.

Prosper Mérimée, of the French Academy. From this article, the concluding lines of which were saddened by the news of Mr. Prescott's death, we shall have occasion to quote on a future page.

"In the reign of Philip II.," remarks Mr Stirling, "unflagging strength and unabated fire are displayed in the treatment of the troubles in the Low Countries, the siege of Malta, the rebellion of the Moriscoes, and the battle of Lepanto."—Encyc. Brit., ut supra, 507.

5. THE LIFE OF CHARLES THE FIFTH AFTER HIS ABDICATION: being a Supplement to a new edition of Robertson's History of the Reign of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, Bost., (Dec. 1856,) 1857, 3 vols. 8vo, Phillips, Sampson & Co.; last ed., J. B. The reign of Charles V. is the intermediate link between those of Ferdinand and Isabella and Philip II., and completes an unbroken period of 150 years of the Spanish annals. To the life of the emperor subsequently to his abdication, some six or seven pages only are devoted by Dr. Robertson; and these contain so many errors that they had been better unwritten. Robertson was unable to obtain the information then locked up in the archives of Simancas. Of this information, and of the labours of his predecessors, Mr. Stirling, M. Pichot, M. Gachard, and M. Mignet, Mr. Prescott has freely availed himself, as stated in his prefaces to the Life of Charles the Fifth, and his own supplement.

It was the earnest desire of Mr. Edward Everett—and where could be found a better counsellor?—that Mr. Prescott should not content himself with supplementing another man's labours:

"I remonstrated with him," says Mr. Everett, "for passing over the reign of the emperor Charles V., urging upon him that the materials which had become accessible since Robertson's time, especially the archives of Simancas, (the want of access to which was so much deplored by that author,) would enable him to treat that period to as good advantage as that of Ferdinand and Isabella or Philip. But he modestly persisted in thinking that the reign of Charles V. was exhausted by Robertson. The supplementary chapter with which he has enriched the edition of Robertson's work published under his supervision a few years since, is sufficient proof that it would have been in his power to construct an original history of the reign of Charles V. which would have fully equalled in interest any that has been produced by him."—Proceedings of the Mass. Hist. Soc., &c., Feb. 1, 1859, 46–47.

"His supplement is not a mere condensation of ample details supplied by others: on the contrary, it is original in form, purpose, and (to some extent) material. Mr. Prescott uses without abusing the rights of a later writer. . . . In Mr. Stirling's volume Yuste is a by-path of history; in Mr. Prescott's it is the highway. . . . After writing and quoting so much from these new books of European history, we scarcely need to add that they are most carefully written, in Mr. Prescott's best manner, and will attract all serious readers."—Lon. Athen., Nov. 29, 1856, 1457–59. Copied into the Bost. Liv. Age, lii. 365–370.

"A sequel in which he related, in his usual agreeable style, the true history of the emperor's retirement and death; events upon which recently-discovered documents have thrown so much light."—MR. STIRLING: Encyc. Brit., ut supra, 505.

"His name is one that might fitly be joined on the same title-page with that of Robertson; and of the union has, in the present instance, certainly come strength."—Lon. Examiner. Copied into the Bost. Liv. Age, lii. 346.

"It bears all the characteristics of style and manner, all the tokens of elaborate research and philosophic vision, which it has been, and will, we trust, yet be, our frequent privilege to record."—A. P. PEABODY, D.D.: N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1857, 281 Critical Notices, 25.

Respecting the foreign versions of Prescott's histories we have the following interesting note, by one who speaks by authority:

"The Italian translations were all made at Florence; but the only one that was ever finished was the Storia del Regno di Ferdinando e Isabella ec. da Ascanio Tempestini, Firenze, 1847–48, 3 vols. in 8vo. The Peru was twice attempted, in a very slovenly manner each time, and failed. The Mexico and Philip II. were not attempted. . . . In Germany—to go on with the translations—there were: 1. Geschichte der Regierung Ferdinand's und Isabella, Leipzig, 1842, 2 vols. 8vo. 2. Geschichte der Eroberung von Mexico, Leipzig, 1845, 2 vols. 8vo. 3. Geschichte der Eroberung von Peru, Leipzig, 1848, 2 vols. 8vo. These three, all published by Brockhaus, were translated, anonymously, by a gentleman named Eberty, who died before any thing else of Prescott's appeared. 4. Geschichte Philipp's des Zweiten was translated by Joh. Scherr, Leipzig, Wigand, 3 vols. 8vo, 1856, &c. 5. Das Klosterleben Karl's V., translated from the addition to Robertson, by Julius Seybl, was published in 1857, in the 23d vol. of Lorck's Conversations- und Reisebibliothek. In France Baudry reprinted, in the original English, 1. Mexico, 1843, 3 vols. 8vo, and 2. Peru, 1847, 3 vols. 8vo. Didot published translations: 1. Conquête du Mexique, by Amédée Pichot, 1846, 3 vols. 8vo, and 2. Règne de Philippe II., by G. Renson and P. Ithier, vol. i. only, just out, 1860. In Mexico the Conquest of Mexico was twice translated and published: 1. by Joaquin Navarro, 1844–46, 3 vols. 8vo, and 2. by José Maria Gonzalez de la Vega, [1844, 2 vols. r. 8vo,] with many new notes by Lucas Alaman."—George Ticknor to S. Austin Allibone, Feb. 2, 1860. For a fuller notice, see Ticknor's Prescott, 1864, Appendix E.

Elaborate reviews of Prescott's histories, as they successively appeared, from the pen of the learned Count Adolphe de Circourt, enriched the columns of the Bibliothèque Universelle de Genève.

Mr. Prescott contributed eight other articles to the North American Review, in addition to the thirteen contained in his Miscellanies: these are, I Byron's Letter on Pope, Oct. 1821; II. Essay-Writing,

April, 1822; III. French and English Tragedy, Jan. 1823; IV. Novel-Writing, July, 1827; V. English Literature of the Nineteenth Century, July, 1832; VI. Tales from the German, Jan. 1838; VII. Kenyon's Poems, July, 1839; VIII. Mariotti's Italy, April, 1842; to which are to be added two Critical Notices: I. Mr. Sprague's Prize Poems, July, 1824; II. Leisure Hours at Sea, April, 1826. For The Club-Room, of which four numbers only appeared, (Feb. to July, 1820,) of which he was the editor, he wrote three articles; and he published many pieces in the local papers. He also contributed, in 1849, to the Collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society, 3d Series, vol. x., 1849, 204–224, a Memoir of John Pickering, LL.D., (supra;) and in 1856, to the National Portrait-Gallery, a biographical sketch of Abbott Lawrence —this was also privately printed, separately, 1856, 4to. We have already referred to a notice in the Revista Contemporanea of Turin, of the articles on Italian poetry (X. and XI., supra) in the volume of Mr. Prescott's Miscellanies. The whole volume is reviewed at some length (the article is principally composed of quotations from Prescott and Petrarch) in the Gentleman's Magazine for March, 1846, 227–245. After an animated eulogy on the histories of Ferdinand and Isabella, and the Conquest of Mexico, in which, as we have seen on a previous page, Mr. Prescott is judged to have "much exceeded Robertson," the critic proceeds to consider the Miscellanies:

"The volume," he says, "is not distinguished for much originality of observation or refinement of critical ingenuity, and still less for any acquaintance with literature beyond what is generally obtained by persons of studious habits and cultivated minds; but Mr. Prescott always shows a sufficient acquaintance with his subject; he commands respect by the temperance of his judgments, and he pleases by the beauty of his language and the elegance of his style."

"Great learning or profundity of criticism there is not," remarks the London Literary Gazette; "but all who love a light and pleasant style of observation thrown over topics of universal interest will find enough here to afford them acceptable information and rational pastime."—August 30, 1845, 576.

"All good," is the verdict of the London Athenæum, "and some noticed at the time, with commendation, in the Athenæum."—Aug. 23, 1845, 835.

"As a critic and essayist," remarks Mr. Stirling, "Mr. Prescott would have attained great eminence had he pursued that path of letters. His essays on Cervantes, Molière, Scott, and Italian narrative poetry, are written with much taste, and with a just appreciation of their subjects. His reviews are none of them examples of the slashing style of criticism. When he turned aside from his own chosen course, it was for the purpose of throwing some fresh light upon the old master-pieces, or of bidding an unknown fellow-labourer welcome to the temple of Fame. If a blockhead was to be lashed, or a knave exposed, he left them to critics who loved to perform such operations. It was very characteristic of his gentle and genial nature that he prefaced his volume of essays, which most readers will be disposed to regard as eminently calm and candid in tone, with the wish 'that some of his critical judgments had been expressed in a more qualified and temperate manner.'"—Encyc. Brit., ut supra, 507.

It is almost needless to remark that Mr. Prescott's merits as a historian were cordially recognized by literary societies at home and abroad. The degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred by Columbia College, New York, in 1840; by the College of South Carolina in 1841; by Harvard University in 1843; and by the University of Oxford in 1850. Shortly after the publication of his History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, as we have seen, he was elected a Corresponding Member of the Royal Academy of History at Madrid; the same honour was awarded by the French Institute, (Class of Moral and Political Philosophy, as successor to Navarrete,) in 1845; by the Royal Society of Literature, (through Henry Hallam;) and by the Society of Antiquaries, (through Lord Mahon;) and in 1852 (see MACAULAY, RT. HON. THOMAS BABINGTON, M.P., BARON MACAULAY, p. 1161, ante) by the Royal Irish Academy.

We have quoted Mr. Stirling's and Mr. Everett's accounts of the evidences of consideration accorded to Mr. Prescott in England during his last visit to Europe, in 1850.

"I was there before him," remarks Mr. Curtis; "and when his purpose to make this visit was known, it is no exaggeration to say that in all ranks and all forms of society in which intelligent men and women were found, there was evident a sensation of anticipated pleasure, a delightful expectation of curiosity and interest, which no countryman of his could witness without pride. What followed after his arrival, you all know. Public and private honours, the homage of the head and the homage of the heart, were showered upon him by all ranks."—Proceedings Mass. Hist. Soc., &c., Feb. 1, 1859, xl.

"Wherever the English language is spoken," writes the historian of the Dutch Republic—"over the whole earth—his name is perfectly familiar. We all of us know what his place was in America. But I can also say that in eight years [1851–1859] passed abroad I never met a single educated person, of whatever nation, that was not well acquainted with his fame, and hardly one who had not read his works. No living American name is so widely spread over the whole world."—J. Lothrop Motley to William Amory, Rome, 20th February, 1859.

"No sooner had I touched my foot upon the English shores," [in May, 1858,] remarks Mr. Felton, "than questions with regard to his condition were addressed to me by numerous English friends; and I happened to meet some of those who had known him best and most affectionately in this country and in Europe. It was a satisfaction to me that I had it in my power to give them the latest news on a subject which seemed to interest the heart of the whole literary world."—Proceedings Mass Hist. Soc., &c., Feb. 1, 1859, 28.

The present writer—the author of this Dictionary—can add something to this testimony: Mr. Ingersoll, the American ambassador to the Court of St. James in 1852–53, wrote to us on his return to this country,

"You are aware of the estimate in which some of our American historians, poets, and writers of fictitious works are held in England. Prescott and Longfellow are at least as much admired abroad as at home. This sentiment is quite strong at the present time, and there is every disposition to strengthen and preserve it."

Lord Macaulay remarks to us, in a letter received since Mr. Prescott's death,

"I had as great a regard for Mr. Prescott as for any man of whom I knew so little, and I think very highly of his works."

Sir Archibald Alison writes us, (Glasgow, June 4, 1859,)

"Mr. Prescott was by far the first historian of America, and he may justly be assigned a place beside the very greatest of modern Europe. To the indispensable requisites of such an author—industry, candour, and impartiality—he united ornamental qualities of the highest grade: a mind stored with various and elegant learning, a poetical temperament, and great, it may almost be said unrivalled, pictorial powers. These great qualities appeared not less strongly in his last production, the History of the Reign of Philip the Second, than in the earlier works—the History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, the History of The Conquest of Mexico, and the History of the Conquest of Peru, which won for him his world-wide fame. The death of such a man, in the prime of life, and in the meridian of his powers, is a loss not to his country alone, but to the whole human race, to whom his beautiful writings will always prove a source of instruction and enjoyment."

Especially would we refer the reader—should the hopes of the public not be disappointed—to a work understood to be in course of preparation,—Memoirs of the Life of Wm. H. Prescott, by George Ticknor, LL.D. (P.S. See TICKNOR, GEORGE, LL.D., No. 9.) But we promised to touch upon two other heads before we concluded this article; and that promise—partially performed already—we proceed to fulfil.

PRESCOTT'S CHARACTERISTICS AS AN AUTHOR.

"At the moment of terminating this analysis of an episode of the great work [Philip II., see supra] of Mr. Prescott, the intelligence reaches me of his sudden death at Boston, at an age when so many and useful labours might still have been hoped for from him. I am ignorant whether he has been able to terminate the work for which he had so conscientiously prepared himself. Few historians, indeed, have evinced such praiseworthy scrupulousness in the composition of their writings. Far from starting with a system laid down a priori, and making the facts he had to deal with bend to it, Mr. Prescott thought that the first duty of a historian was to assemble all its existing documents, classifying and purifying them by a severe criticism, and to employ all his efforts for the discovery of truth. Like Augustin Thierry, he surmounted, by the force of his will, obstacles which seemed almost invincible and to exclude him from the researches of the historian. . . . Of a just and upright spirit, he had a horror of paradox. He never allowed himself to be drawn away by it, and often condemned himself to long investigation to refute even the most audacious assertions. His criticism, full at once of good sense and acuteness, was never deceived in the choice of documents, and his discernment is as remarkable as his good faith. If he may be reproached with often hesitating, even after a long investigation, to pronounce a definitive judgment, we must at least acknowledge that he omitted nothing to prepare the way for it, and that the author, too timid perhaps to decide, always leaves his reader sufficiently instructed to need no other guide."—M. PROSPER MÉRIMÉE: Revue des Deux Mondes, tome XX., 1859, 600.

"As a writer, Mr. Prescott occupies a distinguished place in the first rank of English historians. His fidelity and industry—qualities which form the foundation of historical merit—are universally acknowledged. It has been doubted, and it is doubtful, whether his powers of philosophical analysis were equal to his skill in synthetical arrangement,—whether he could penetrate to vital principles as happily as he could marshal facts and picture events. It is certain that the latter portions of the duty of an historian were those to which he specially applied himself. His practice may be justified on the ground of the subdivision of literary labour which at present obtains, greatly to the advantage of the accuracy of our knowledge. To describe clearly what was done in a particular age, and how it was done, is in itself an important and difficult task; to show why it was done, by discovering the hidden causes which shaped and coloured events, belongs perhaps more properly to writers who take a more comprehensive view of the chart of the world's history. In the art of narrative Mr. Prescott had few rivals—very few equals—in our language. So pure and idiomatic is his English that it is rarely indeed that the most critical ear detects, in the use of a word or the construction of a phrase, the transatlantic origin of the writer. . . . Mr. Prescott's chapters on manners and literature are not less lively and picturesque than his record of contemporary events which these chapters illustrate. Of modern historians he was one of the first to acknowledge and to exhibit the importance of this kind of illustration, which his immediate predecessors had been too much in the habit of neglecting. In another respect also his works set an example well worthy of general adoption. Not content with embodying the result of his own researches, he constructed a road to the fountains from which he had drawn and the mines in which he had toiled, in order, to use his own words, 'to put the reader in a position for judging for himself, and thus for revising, and, if need be, of reversing, the judgments of the historian.' "—WM. STIRLING: Encyc. Brit., ut supra, 506, 507.

"He has a high sense of the obligation of an historian to explore every source of information relating to his subject; to spare neither industry, nor, we may add, expense, in the collection of his materials."—Lon. Quar. Rev., Dec. 1843, 188. See, also, Lon. Times, Jan. 12, 1857.

"Truth was his first aim, as far as he could detect it in the conflicting records of events; and his next aim was to impress this truth, in its genuine colours, upon the reader. The characters and motives of men were weighed in the scales of justice, as they appeared to him after careful research and mature thought. In all these qualities of an accomplished historian, we may safely challenge for him a comparison with any other writer."—JARED SPARKS: Proceedings Mass. Hist. Soc., &c., Feb. 1, 1859, 11.

"It is a saying that 'the style is the man;' and of no great author in the literature of the world is that saying more true than of him whose loss we mourn. For in the transparent simplicity and undimmed beauty and candour of his style were read the endearing qualities of his soul; so that his personal friends are found wherever literature is known, and the love for him is co-extensive with the world of letters,—not limited to those who speak our Anglo-Saxon mother-language, to the literature of which he has contributed such splendid works, but co-extensive with the civilized languages of the human race."—C. C. FELTON: Ibid., 27.

"So long as in ages far distant, and not only in countries now refined and polished, but in those not yet brought into the domain of civilization, the remarkable epoch which he has described shall attract the attention of men; so long as the consolidation of the Spanish monarchy, and the expulsion of the Moors, the mighty theme of the discovery of America, the sorrowful glories of Columbus, the mail-clad forms of Cortez and Pizarro and the other grim conquistadores, trampling new-found empires under the hoofs of their cavalry, shall be subjects of literary interest; so long as the blood shall curdle at the cruelties of Alva, and the fierce struggle of the Moslem in the East,—so long will the writings of our friend be read."—EDWARD EVERETT: Ibid., 50.

"The excellence of his productions is, in part, transparent to every reader. Compare what he has written with the most of what others have left on the same subjects, and Prescott's superiority beams upon you from the contrast. The easy flow of his language, and the faultless lucidity of his style, may make the reader forget the unremitting toil which the narrative has cost; but the critical inquirer sees everywhere the fruits of investigation rigidly and most perseveringly pursued, and an impartiality and soundness of judgment which give authority to every statement and weight to every conclusion."—GEORGE BANCROFT: Proceedings New York Hist. Soc., Feb. 1, 1859: Prescott Memorial, xiii.

PRESCOTT'S CHARACTERISTICS AS A MAN.

In the consideration of the literary characteristics of Mr. Prescott, we were obliged to omit much which we would have gladly quoted, and in this part of our subject, too, want of space must enforce brevity. To read, that we might write, men's lives, has been our vocation for years: we have seldom found the record so clear, so bright,—we have rarely encountered such touching testimonies of love and reverence to the best qualities of humanity,—as in the present instance. At the solemn convocation of the literary brethren of the deceased,—an assemblage perhaps the most distinguished which the New World has yet seen,—one of his daily associates—one, too, who had known him from his early years—called all who had been equally fortunate to bear witness that, "to those who knew him from the days of his bright boyhood down to his latest years, when he stood before the world crowned with its honours, the elements that constituted the peculiar charm of his character seemed always to be the same; that his life—his whole life—was . . . governed by a prevalent sense of duty to God and love to man; and that he has been taken from us . . . with a heart whose affections grew warmer and more tender to the last."—GEORGE TICKNOR: Proceedings, &c. Mass. Hist. Soc., Feb. 1, 1859, vii. See, also, Ticknor's Hist. of Spanish Literature, Pref., x.

"Of all the men whom I have known," remarked one of his classmates, on the same occasion, "I have never known one so little changed by the conventionalities of society and the hard trial of success and prosperity. At college, and on the morning of the day he died, he was the same in his dispositions; the same in his outward manners; the same in his habits of thought and feeling; the same, to a remarkable degree, even in his attitudes and looks. It was because his character was a true and real character. . . . He was one of the happy few whom all love to hear praised. . . . The shadow of death is upon us; but it is a beautiful and accomplished life which we are called to consider, and it will do us good to ponder it well."—REV. DR. WALKER, President of Harvard University.

"I know not in what words to speak of Prescott. He was my oldest friend,—the last friend of my boyhood. Our fathers were intimate friends, and their intimacy fell to us as an inheritance. His genial face, and that cordial manner which was but the transparent vesture of his constant kindness, I shall meet no more. . . . Nor need I add my testimony to the universal recognition of the ability, the industry, the accurate learning, the admirable judgment, and the perfect taste which have placed him at the head of our literature and made him our pride."—THEOPHILUS PARSONS, LL.D., Law Professor Harvard University: Memoir of Chief-Justice Parsons, 1859, 187.

"All who knew him will say he was himself greater and better than his writings. While his histories prove him to have felt that he owed his time to the service of mankind, every thing about him marked him out to be the most beloved of companions, and the life and joy and pride of society. . . . Standing as it were by his grave, we cannot recall any thing in his manner, his character, his endowments, or his conduct that we could wish changed."—GEORGE BANCROFT: Prescott Memorial, xiv.

Such is the testimony (and much more is before us) of intimate and life-long associates; and those who saw him every day, and all day, confirm the truth of the record:

"The distinguishing traits of Mr. Prescott's personal character"—it is his private secretary, Mr. Robert H. Carter, who thus writes—"were all agreeable ones. In daily intercourse of the most intimate kind, during a whole year, I never perceived any thing unpleasant in his conduct or disposition. Though not at all diffident, he was singularly modest and unassuming. He had not a particle of arrogance or haughtiness. It required the closest scrutiny to detect that he had any share of the natural vanity of man. Praise did not elate him, nor censure disturb him. He read all the criticisms upon his works, favourable and unfavourable, and was always eager to profit by any suggestions of improvement. . . . Of Mr. Prescott's benevolence to the suffering and the destitute—a benevolence, however, which is almost a universal characteristic in the highest class of Boston society—I could cite many striking instances, if it were proper to speak of private affairs. . . . He carried his kindliness of disposition not only into his public but into his private writings. In the hundreds of letters, many of the most confidential character, treating freely of other authors, and of a great variety of persons, which I wrote at his dictation, not a single unkind or harsh or sneering expression occurs. He would write nothing of a man which he would not say to his face. He would not flatter; and, if he could not honestly praise, he said nothing. He was very warmly attached to his friends, and constant in his attachments, and would never permit any thing to be said against them in their absence. . . . Mr. Prescott's cheerfulness and amiability were truly admirable. He had a finely-wrought, sensitive organization; he was high-spirited, courageous, resolute, independent; was free from cant or affectation of any sort. Yet no annoyance, great or small, the most painful illness or the most intolerable bore, could disturb his equanimity or render him in the least degree sullen, or fretful, or discourteous. He was always gay, good-humoured, and manly; most gentle and affectionate to his family, most kind and gracious to all around him. This made him a peculiarly delightful companion; and I look to the year I passed in his service as the most agreeable in my life."—Prescott Memorial, xxiii., xxiv.

Well, therefore, is it affirmed by his distinguished foreign biographer—also a personal friend of the subject of his interesting sketch,—

"His eminence as a writer was not more cordially recognized than the remarkable worth and beauty of his character as a man. . . . Adored by his family and familiar friends, he was hardly less esteemed by the whole society of his native city. In his success, literary and social, almost every American with whom his friends in Europe conversed, appeared to take a personal interest and to feel an honest pride. Amongst the organs of the press, and at the meetings of various literary societies, his death elicited the most touching expressions of regard and respect from many of the most distinguished of his countrymen. . . . When those who knew and loved Mr. Prescott shall have passed away, his memory will still be cherished by his countrymen, not only for the sake of works which will always rank amongst the chief monuments of American literature, but also for the sake of his pure and graceful life, which did honour to his literary calling."—Wm. Stirling: Encyc. Brit., ubi supra, 506, 507.

In a preceding extract from the sketch from which we have just quoted, Mr. Stirling refers to the willingness with which Mr. Prescott was wont to "welcome an unknown fellow-labourer to the temple of Fame." Of this nobility of disposition we have a well-told instance in a letter from Mr. J. Lothrop Motley to Mr. Amory, Mr. Prescott's brother-in-law, respecting a work noticed on an earlier page. So far from discouraging an enterprise—Mr. Motley's projected History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic—which it was feared the prospective author of the Life of Philip the Second might consider an invasion of a portion of his own territory, Mr. Prescott urged his visitor "in the warmest and most earnest manner to proceed on the course he had marked out for himself," "wished him every success, and stated that if there were any books in his library bearing on his subject they were entirely at his service." "You may not remember the circumstances, which, however, I have often mentioned to you," remarks Mr. Motley to his correspondent; "but, when I forget them, I hope that my right hand may forget its cunning." "You know," he continues, "how kindly he always spoke of and to me; and the generous manner in which, without the slightest hint from me, and entirely unexpected by me, he attracted the eyes of his hosts of readers to my forthcoming work, by so handsomely alluding to it in the preface to his own [Philip the Second] must be almost as fresh in your memory as it is in mine." See Proceed. Mass. Hist. Soc., 1858–60, 266, 431.

Here we take up the story: greatly impressed with the merits of Mr. Motley's History, and anxious to do justice to those merits in this volume, when about recording the judgments of eminent critics on the Rise of the Dutch Republic, we asked Mr. Prescott for his opinion of a work which, in advance of its completion, he had so courteously introduced to the public. His cordial response has been already recorded on a preceding page: see Motley, John Lothrop, p. 1380.

Something more we would have said respecting this characteristic trait of Mr. Prescott; of the graceful and gracious manner in which, in the maturity of his well-earned honours and world-wide fame, the historian of two hemispheres would encourage the unknown aspirant to literary honours to perseverance in the struggle of honourable ambition,—in efforts designed to enlarge the domain of useful knowledge, or to record, for the benefit of later generations, the achievements of science and the triumphs of letters, ("alas! we feel we are no actors here!") something we could have said drawn from our own experience.

Even this imperfect and faltering testimony may be deemed scarcely delicate; but we had rather that others should accuse of ostentation than that our own heart should convict us of ingratitude. Of the friendly and lively interest evinced from the first, by the departed, in the labours of one who had no claim upon his consideration, we trust we shall never cease to be mindful.

Thus, loving and beloved, happy and bestowing happiness, in life, he is honoured and lamented in death, and his name shall be held in grateful remembrance in all future generations. Had his family given only him to the Republic, it had been much; but so long as the sword, the ermine, and the pen are connected with the story of American civilization, so long shall the memory of three generations of Prescotts be dear to the hearts of the American people.

Price, Richard, D.D., 1723–1791, a native of the parish of Llangeinor, Glamorganshire, was educated in Wales and at Coward's Dissenting Academy, London; chaplain to Mr. Streatfield, Stoke Newington, 1743–56, also assisting Dr. Chandler at the Old Jewry, and other preachers; married Miss Blundell, 1757, and settled at Hackney; subsequently removed to Newington Green, where he resided until 1786, when, on the death of his wife, he returned to Hackney; next chosen afternoon preacher at the meeting-house in Poor Jewry Street, but resigned this post on being elected pastor of the Gravelpit Meeting, Hackney, and afternoon preacher at Newington Green; resigned these charges with a farewell sermon, February, 1791, and died April 19 of same year. For two years (1786–88) he was a mathematical tutor in the Dissenting Academy at Hackney. In his theological sentiments he was a semi-Arian or low Arian. His services to the cause of American Independence elicited in 1778 an invitation from Congress, through Dr. Franklin and others, to "come and reside among a people who knew how to appreciate his talents." This overture, based upon the promise of a liberal provision, in consideration of his past and prospective labours in the cause of freedom, was not accepted. He also pub. a number of papers on the doctrine of chances, (see Lubbock's Essay on Probability,) annuities, duration of life, transit of Venus, &c., in Phil. Trans., 1764–76. He had a correspondence with Dr. Priestley, pub. by the latter, in 1778, under the title of A Free Discussion of the Doctrine of Materialism and Philosophical Necessity, in a Correspondence between Dr. Price and Dr. Priestley:

"In his controversy with Priestley particularly he showed how strongly he viewed the philosophical aberration of the age, and how earnestly he desired to place moral and metaphysical truth upon its deeper and truer foundation. . . . Almost the only writer of this [the rationalistic] school whose works are likely to form a part of our standard philosophy, is Dr. Richard Price."—MORELL: see No. 1.

In this high estimate of the merits of Price's philosophical writings, Mr. Morell is not singular:

"He investigated with acuteness and ability many important questions relative to morals, and controverted the doctrine of a Moral Sense, as irreconcilable with the unalterable character of moral ideas, which, as well as those of Substance and Cause, he maintained to be eternal and original principles of the intellect itself, independent of the Divine Will."—TENNEMAN: ut supra.

"If in England you only look at London in the eighteenth century, you will doubtless there see little else than sensualism. But even at London you would find, by the side of Priestley, Price, that ardent friend of liberty, that ingenious and profound economist, who renewed and brilliantly sustained the Platonic idealism of Cudworth. I know that Price is an isolated phenomenon at London; but the whole Scotch school is more or less spiritualistic."—COUSIN: ut supra.

But Mackintosh (ut supra) by no means shares in this enthusiasm; nor can it be expected that the admirers of Locke should discover much merit in his opponent. Sir James's estimate of the characteristics of Price will be found in the Edinburgh Review, June, 1815, 171–172, and has been already cited: see MORGAN, WILLIAM, No. 3, also Nos. 1 and 2. Morgan's Memoirs of Price are also noticed in London Monthly Review, lxxxiii. 77, and Boston Christian Disciple, ii. 134. Although unfortunate in his grand panacea for financial consumption,—the famous Sinking-Fund Scheme, (see Edin. Rev., xxxix. 32–34; GALE, S.; HAMILTON, ROBERT, LL.D., No. 3,) Price alleges that Pitt selected the worst of the three schemes he offered him,—his acuteness as a political arithmetician is not to be questioned. His personal character was most exemplary, (see Mrs. Chapone's Miscellanies,) and his controversial manners a model to zealous disputants.

The historian of the Roman Empire, in writing to Lord Sheffield respecting the French Revolutionists of 1789, thus refers to our zealous advocate of political and religious freedom:

"The honestest of the Assembly, a set of wild visionaries like our Dr. Price."—Gibbon's Miscell. Works, ed. 1837, 131.

Price, Thomas, 1787–1848, a native of Brecknockshire, educated at the College of Brecknock; was ordained in 1812; for thirteen years performed the duties of curacies about Crickhowel, and in 1825 received the vicarage of Cwmdu, which he retained until his death. He was a devoted student of Welsh literature, and did much to endear it at home and recommend it abroad. He pub. in 1829, 8vo, An Essay on the Physiognomy and Physiology of the Present Inhabitants of Britain, with Reference to their Origin as Goths and Celts. His principal work is the Hanes Cymrn a chenedl y Cymry ór cynoesoedd hyd at Furwolaeth Llewelyn ap Gruffydd, (History of Wales and the Welsh Nation from the Early Ages to the Death of Llewelyn ap Gruffydd,) when the country was united with England. His history (which should be in connection with the histories of Wales in English by Warrington and Woodman) was issued in fourteen numbers, (about 800 pages in all,) 1836–42. Another work of Mr. Price's, which attracted considerable attention, was The Geographical Progress of Empire and Civilization, (Llandovery, 1847–48,) a portion of which appeared in the London Athenæum for 1844, (see Nos. 894, 895,) and was republished in the Allgemeine Zeitung. A notice of this work will be found in the Athenæum for 1847, 1051. He contributed, chiefly under the signature of Carnhuanawc, to fifteen Welsh periodicals, and warmly encouraged the Eisteddfods, or literary and musical gatherings of his countrypeople. Of his English works the most important will be found in vol. i. (1854) of the Literary Remains of Rev. Thomas Price, with a Memoir of his Life, by Jane Williams, Ysgafell, Llandovery, 2 vols. 8vo. Vol. ii. (1855) is occupied with Miss Williams's Memoir, which—and the first volume also—every one interested in Welsh literature (the number of such is disgracefully small in Great Britain) should peruse. Vol. i. is briefly noticed in the Athenæum, 1854, 1587, and in the Literary Gazette, 1854, 905; and vol. ii. in Lon. Athen., 1855, 1331, and Lon. Lit. Gaz., 1855, 773. A memoir of Mr. Price will be found in London Gent. Mag., Feb. 1849, 212. So long as the Eisteddfods of Wales are sustained,—and may that be forever!—so long will the memory of Carnhuanawc (Man of the Sunny Mound) be had in grateful remembrance.

New ed., including Nos. 3 and 5, and an Essay on the Origin of Taste, and much additional matter, by Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, Bart., with 60 engravings, 1842, r. 8vo. This is a work of great merit, both as regards matter and manner, although it is thought that Dugald Stewart (Philosophical Essays) has successfully attacked some of Price's positions.

Prideaux's Connection was trans. into French, (Amst., 1728, 6 vols. 12mo,) and (with John Dierberghe's annotations) into Dutch. Le Clerc pub. a critical examination of it, which appeared in English, Lon., 1722, 8vo. The Connection "contains a large mass of erudition and accurate information on every topic of Jewish history and antiquities, and on all the links which connected that peculiar people with the surrounding nations. It is indispensable to the biblical and interesting to the general scholar. . . . Le Clerc's exceptions are not of great importance."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"Full of information, accurate and valuable. . . . Shuckford and Russell with inferior judgment."—Bickersteth's C. S., 422.

Orme (supra) considers Shuckford's Connection (Russell was not then published) "not equal in talent or interest to Prideaux." See, also, notices of Prideaux's Connection, by Thos. Gordon, in Cato's Letters, and in Gibbon's Decline and Fall, 969, n., Miscell. Works, 20.

An eminent critic remarks of Jahn's History of the Hebrew Commonwealth, (see Stowe, Calvin E., D.D., No. 1,)

"The design of this work is to impart a succinct and critically arranged history of the Hebrews, from their first rise in Abraham down to the destruction of Jerusalem. We have no book in our language which does this in such a manner as to satisfy the wants of a critical student at the present time. The works of Shuckford and Prideaux, which in respect to learning may be mentioned with approbation, particularly the latter, are so copious and contain so much irrelevant matter that the student goes through them with toil and little fruit of his labour."—Moses Stuart.

Priestley, Joseph, LL.D., March 13, 1733–Feb. 6, 1804, a native of Birstal-Fieldhead, six miles southwest of Leeds, Yorkshire, England, where his father was a cloth-dresser, on the death of his mother was adopted in his sixth year by a paternal aunt, Miss Keighley, who placed him at a free grammar-school, where he acquired an elementary knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages, to which he added the Hebrew, French, Italian and German. In 1752 he entered the Dissenting Academy at Daventry, (afterwards Coward College;) in 1755 became minister to a congregation at Needham-Market, Suffolk; from 1758 to 1761 officiated as minister and schoolmaster at Nantwich, Cheshire; from 1761 to 1767 was tutor in the languages and belles-lettres at Warrington Academy; in 1767 became pastor of Mill-Hill Chapel, Leeds; from 1773 to 1780 was librarian and literary companion to the Earl of Shelburne, (afterwards first Marquis of Lansdowne,) at a salary of £250 and a retiring pension for life of £150; and in 1780 became minister to the principal Dissenting congregation at Birmingham. In 1790 he irritated the populace by his Familiar Letters to the Inhabitants of Birmingham, advocating the claims of the Dissenters; and in 1791 he again aroused public animosity by his justification of the French Revolution in his Letters to Edmund Burke, occasioned by Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France. The 14th of July in the last-named year was observed by Priestley's friends—he was not himself present at the entertainment—by a festival in commemoration of the destruction of the Bastille. The dinner-party was disturbed by a mob which destroyed the tavern, and the next day many edifices were pillaged and burnt. Of course Priestley's chapel and house were prominent objects of attack. The politician and his family escaped, (by flight,) but his library, manuscripts, and philosophical apparatus were scattered to the winds.

"The law which those men of change and mischief would have extinguished, gave them compensation for the losses which nothing but their insults to all law had caused. . . . Priestley swelled his claim to £4122. A jury, after a long and impartial examination during a trial of nine years, contemptuously cut down the claim to little more than one-half, £2502."—Blackw. Mag., Sept. 1835, 364.

"The compensation which he obtained fell short, according to his own account, by £2000 of his loss. As, however, an ample subscription was made for him, and as his brother-in-law generously gave him £10,000, with an annuity of £200 for life, he could not be other than a large gainer by the execrable violence of which he had been the victim; and, as he never allowed any of his writings to remain unpublished for even the shortest time after they were finished, it is not likely that any loss of an irreparable kind was incurred by the burning of his papers."—LORD BROUGHAM: Lives of Philosophers of the Time of George III., ed. 1855, 83–84: Priestley.

"Every man of sober mind, whilst he commiserated Dr. Priestley as an unfortunate man and esteemed him as a very ingenious one, could view him in no other light than as the victim of his own folly and misguided passions."—DE QUINCEY: Blackw. Mag., June, 1831, 907; and in his Philosophical Writers, ii., Bost., 1854, 262: Dr. Parr.

"A banditti, which had been previously stimulated, as it has since been excused and panegyrised, by incendiary libellers, have wreaked their vengeance on a philosopher, illustrious by his talents and his writings, venerable for the spotless purity of his life, and amiable for the unoffending simplicity of his manners."—SIR J. MACKINTOSH: Defence of the French Revolution: Miscell. Works, ed. 1854, iii. 170. See, also, The Traditional Policy of the Times, Manches., 1864, 8vo.

Priestley now removed to Hackney, where he succeeded his friend Dr. Richard Price (supra) in the pastoral office, and also in the post of Principal of the Hackney Academy. His situation, however, did not prove an agreeable one, and in 1794 he determined to follow his sons, who had settled in America. He arrived at New York on the 4th of June of that year; declined the professorship of chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia; in July settled at Northumberland, Pennsylvania, where he assisted his son in farming 300 acres of land, and here chiefly resided, making occasional excursions to Philadelphia and other places, until his death in 1804. He declined the offer of $1000 for a course of Lectures on Experimental Philosophy to be delivered in Philadelphia, but often preached in that city, and occasionally at Northumberland. In 1796 and 1797 he delivered in Philadelphia two Series of Discourses relating to the Evidences of Revealed Religion, which were pub. in that city in the same years in 2 volumes 8vo, (one of these was dedicated to John Adams;) and in 1797 he pub. at Phila. a 12mo tract of 38 pages, entitled Outline of the Evidences of Revealed Religion.

"In America he again suffered considerable disappointment. His religion was too much for those who had ceased to care for sacred things, and far too scanty for those who still were Christians,—while his republican opinions were exceedingly distasteful, because they were tinged with a decided admiration for France. . . . We find his leanings are all against the Federal party, and his censures of the great Chief of the Union little concealed. He felt for the Democratic party, the French alliance, the enemies of English partialities, and he regarded Washington as ungrateful because he would not, from a recollection of the services of France twenty years before to American independence, consent to make America dependent upon France."—LORD BROUGHAM: ubi supra, 84, 87.

In 1794 appeared Observations on the Emigration of Dr. Priestley, and on the Several Addresses delivered to him on his Arrival at New York, Phila., 8vo; Lon., 8vo; and in 1795 was pub., in New York, A Twig of Birch for a Butting Calf; or, Strictures upon Remarks on the Emigration of Dr. Joseph Priestley: by a Brother of the Birch, 8vo. Of Dr. Priestley's publications, which amount to no less than 141 in number, (in one year 10,) a complete list (the one in the Lon. Gent. Mag., April, 1804, 375–378, and that in Watt's Bibl. Brit., are imperfect) will be found in vol. ii., 537–544, of Rutt's Collection of his Theological and Miscellaneous Works, (excluding the Scientific,) Hackney, 1817–32, (new title-page, 1824,) 26 vols. 8vo; 250 copies printed at £15 15*s.* Vols. i. and ii. are taken up with his Life and Correspondence, and these (1832) can be had separately. These two volumes consist in part of the Memoirs of Dr. Joseph Priestley to the Year 1795, written by Himself; with a Continuation to the Time of his Decease, by his son, Joseph Priestley; and Observations on his Writings, by Thomas Cooper, President Judge of the Fourth District of Pennsylvania, and the Reverend William Christie, Northumberland, 1806, 2 vols. 8vo; Lon., 1805–07, 2 vols. 8vo, with additions, and Priestley's Correspondence, contributed by Mr. Rutt:

"Edited [the Works, ut supra] by the affectionate care of an able and worthy man."—LORD BROUGHAM: Philosophers, &c., 74, n.

Of the Memoirs, a review by Lord Jeffrey will be found in the Edinburgh Review, Oct. 18 8, 136–161. That portion of the Review which combats Priestley's Doctrine of Materialism was republished in Jeffrey's Contributions to Edinburgh Review, 1853, 630–636.

"The Memoirs are written with great conciseness and simplicity, and present a very singular picture of that indefatigable activity, that bigoted vanity, that precipitation, cheerfulness, and sincerity, which made up the character of this restless philosopher. . . . The Continuation by his son is more diffuse and languid, though the detail of his father's last days be interesting and satisfactory. . . . The Observations annexed by Mr. Cooper are the work, we think, of a powerful, presumptuous, and untractable understanding. They are written in a defying, dogmatical, unaccommodating style; with much force of reasoning for the most part, but often with great rashness and arrogance; and occasionally with a cant of philosophism, and a tang of party politics, which communicate an air of vulgarity to the whole work, and irresistibly excite a smile at the expense of this magnanimous despiser of all sorts of prejudice and bigotry."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Rev., Oct. 1806, 136, 141.

See Cooper, Thomas, M.D., LL.D.

"I have just read Priestley's Life of himself. It is an honest, plain, and somewhat dry account of a well-spent life."—Sir J. Mackintosh, Sept. 13, 1807: Life, i., chap. vii.

As regards his works,

"He is one of the most voluminous writers of any age or country, and probably he is of all voluminous writers the one who has the fewest readers."—Lord Brougham's Philosophers, &c., 74.

Those therefore who prefer a few "bricks" to the whole edifice can consult Views of Christian Truth, Piety, and Morality, selected from the Writings of Dr. Priestley, by the Rev. A. Norton, Lon., 12mo. We shall proceed to notice,

I. Priestley's Publications, and then shall briefly consider:

II. Priestley the Natural Philosopher.

III. Priestley the Moral Philosopher.

IV. Priestley the Man.

Priestley the Theologian has already come under our notice on a preceding page, (Horsley, Samuel, LL.D.;) and further information can be obtained from Mr. Rutt's Memoir and the other authorities cited in this sketch.

Priestley's Publications. 1. Rudiments of English Grammar, Lon., 1762, '63, '68, '69, '72, 12mo. His first publication. 2. Course of Lects. on the Theory of Language and Universal Grammar, Warr., 1762, 12mo; last eds., with Addit. Notes by J. T. Rutt, 1825, '26, '33, r. 8vo. 3. Chart of Biography, Warr., 1765, 12mo; Lon., 1790, 12mo; Phila., 1803, 8vo. See No. 8; Hurford, Mrs. John. 4. Essay on a Course of Liberal Education, &c., with Plans of Lects. on the Study of History, &c., 1765, 8vo; Birm., 1788, 4to; Dubl., 1791, 8vo; Lon., 1793, 2 vols. 8vo; Phila., 1803, 2 vols. 8vo. See Hoffman's Leg. Stu., 581; Nicolson, William, No. 3. 5. Hist. and Present State of Electricity, with Original Experiments, Lon., 1767, 4to. Additions, 1770, 4to; 5th ed. of whole work, 1794, 4to. See No. 7. It was trans. into several foreign languages, and gained him admission into the Royal Society. The design was communicated by the author to Franklin personally in London, and the latter undertook to supply Priestley with the necessary books. In less than a year after this conversation Priestley sent Franklin a copy of his history in print.

"Though somewhat tame and tedious, it is intelligent, clear, and judicious."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Rev., ix. 152.

"Carelessly written."—Thomas Thomson, M.D.

"It is a careless and superficial work, hastily written, as is his 'History of Vision,' [No. 11, infra,] and the original experiments afforded no new information of any value."—Lord Brougham: Philos., &c., 72.

"It is justly deemed a valuable performance, and its original experiments are allowed to be very ingenious."—Encyc. Brit., 9th ed., xviii., 1859, 514.

6. Essays on the Principles of Governments, and on the Nature of Political, Civil, and Religious Liberty, 1768, 8vo; 1771, 8vo. 7. Introduction to the Study of Electricity, 1769, 8vo. See No. 5. 8. Chart of History, 1770, 8vo. See No. 3. 9. Introduction to Perspective, 1770, 8vo. 10. Directions for Impregnating Water with Fixed Air, 1772, 8vo. 11. Hist. and Present State of Discoveries relating to Vision, Light, and Colours, 1772, 2 vols. 4to.

"Hasty and imperfect."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Rev., ix. 152. See No. 5.

"This is allowed to be a performance of great merit and lucid arrangement; but it did not bring him such a large share of popularity as his History of Electricity, because it is probable that he was scarcely qualified to explain the more abstruse parts of the science."—Encyc. Brit., ut supra, No. 5. See, also, Cunningham's Biog. Hist. of Eng., viii. 112.

12. Institutes of Natural and Revealed Religion, 1772–3–4, 3 vols. 12mo. Other eds.: Birm, 1782, 2 vols. 8vo; Lon., 1794, 2 vols. 8vo; 1808, 2 vols. 8vo.

"It is almost the only work of modern Socinians, in the form of a regular system of religion; and in that view it may contribute to the gratification of curiosity, and indirect advantage, in an hour of relaxation and controversy."—Williams's C. P., ed. 1844, 304.

"The Bishop [Percy] wishes Mr. Pinkerton would carefully read Dr. Priestley's 'Institutes of Natural and Revealed Religion,' in 2 vols. 8vo, before he decides that all of that school have given up the Old Testament, as Mr. Pinkerton seems to hint in a former letter; but indeed he wishes Mr. Pinkerton would read them on other accounts."—Bishop Percy to John Pinkerton, Feb. 28, 1787: Nichols's Illust. of Lit. Hist., viii., 1858, 135.

"Of Dr. Priestley's theological works, he [Dr. Johnson] remarked, that they tended to unsettle every thing, and yet settled nothing."—De. Maxwell: Boswell's Johnson, ed. 1848, r. 8vo, 218.

13. On the Elements of Natural Religion, 1772, 8vo. 14. Experiments and Observations on Different Kinds of Air, 1774–77, 3 vols. 8vo; 2d ed., 1781–86, 6 vols. 8vo. Abridged and Methodized, with many Addits., 1790, 5 vols. 8vo. See Auserlesene Kleine Werke dreyer berühmter Englischer Chymisten, Priestley, Henry, und Black, Kopenh., 1774, 8vo. See, also, No. 27. 15. An Examination of Dr. Reid's Inquiry into the Human Mind, on the Principles of Common Sense, Dr. Beattie's Essay on Truth, and Dr. Oswald's Appeal to Common Sense in Behalf of Religion, Lon., 1774, '75, 8vo. See Reid's Works, by Sir Wm. Hamilton; Hamilton's Metaphysics; Stewart's Philos. Essays; Morell's Mod. Philos., ut infra, No. 16. 16. Hartley's Theory of the Human Mind, &c., 1775, 8vo. See Hartley, David, M.D.; Morell's Hist. of Mod. Philos., 2d ed., 1847, i. 142, 145. 17. Harmony of the Evangelists in Greek, 1777, '78, 4to. In English, with Crit. Disserts, Paraphrase, and Notes, 1780, 4to. Already noticed: see Newcome, William, D.D., Nos. 4, 5. See, also, Horne's Bibl. Bib., 134; Orme's Bibl. Bib., 362; Lowndes's Brit. Lib., 74; Lon. Month. "The notes [in the English version] are not all by Dr. Priestley: some of them are supplied by Mr. Turner of Wakefield, and others by Dr. Jebb. They were all of the same mind on doctrinal subjects; and whenever any topic of importance occurs, Socinianism, of course, is avowed. Not a few of the notes, however, are valuable and worthy of consideration."—Orme, ubi supra.

18. Course of Lectures on Oratory and Criticism, 1777, 4to. 19. Disquisitions relating to Matter and Spirit, 1777, 8vo; 2d ed., Birm., 1782, 2 vols. 8vo. See No. 20. 20. The Doctrine of Philosophical Necessity, being an Appendix to the Disquisitions, [No. 19, supra,] &c., Lon., 1777, 8vo. Priestley defended his doctrine of Philosophical Necessity by (21, 22) two Letters to John Palmer, 1779–80, both 8vo, and (23) one Letter to Jacob Bryant, 1780, 8vo. See H. Walpole's Letters, ed. 1861, vii. 364. See, also,—24. "Some parts of this work have been animadverted on in a very able manner by Dr. Horsley [in Monthly Review] and others; nor has Dr. Priestley been backward in his replies, [1783, 2 vols. 8vo; 1784, 8vo; 1786, 8vo.]"—BISHOP WATSON.

See, also, ROWLES, SAMUEL, No. 2; VEYSIE, DANIEL, No. 2.

Priestley, who had in his Letters, No. 28, offered some Animadversions on the two last chapters of the first volume of Gibbon's History, sent a copy of his History of the Corruptions of Christianity, &c. to the historian. The letter which accompanied it displeased the latter, and led to a correspondence between the parties, which Priestley, against Gibbon's protest, most dishonourably, published soon after Gibbon's death, and exhibited before that event. See Gibbon's Miscell. Works, ed. 1837, 98, 309–313. Priestley certainly appears to but little advantage in the affair:

"The minister of the gospel had all the heat to himself: at least in the layman it was latent, if it existed at all. He was desirous of drawing his adversary into a controversy, and, failing in this, lost his temper, and had the vulgar recourse to calling names and imputing motives. Mr. Gibbon may have shown some superciliousness in his treatment of this angry polemic; but he certainly had a good right to marvel at the intolerance of one whose heterodoxy was so universal as to condemn ["overthrow," Gibbon has it] by circumscribing the inspiration of the Evangelists, and to condemn the religion of every Christian nation, as a fable less innocent, not less absurd, than Mahomet's journey to the third heaven."—LORD BROUGHAM: Philos., &c., 82.

The historian, indeed, would have no "controversy" with the petulant philosopher; but he took a terrible revenge for his impertinence: at the close of the 54th chapter of the Decline and Fall he remarks,

"The friends of Christianity are alarmed at the boundless impulse of inquiry and skepticism. . . . The pillars of revelation are shaken by those men who preserve the name without the substance of religion, who indulge the license without the temper of philosophy;"

and thus in the face of the world he superscribes this formidable indictment:

"I shall recommend to public animadversion two passages in Dr. Priestley, which betray the ultimate tendency of his opinions. At the first of these (Hist. of the Corruptions of Christianity, vol. i. p. 275, 276) the priest, at the second (vol. i. p. 484) the magistrate, may tremble!"—Note.

See, also, chapter xlvii., Note 5th.

"The late Mr. Gibbon well understood Dr. Priestley's character and opinions, and expressed himself strongly on that subject. No man of discernment can see their direct tendency but with reprobation, and sometimes not without fear and horror, (1794.)"—Pursuits of Lit.: Dialogue the First, Note 12, q. v. And see Dialogue the Fourth, Note 158.

"This is modest in the extreme, after the author of the work in question has been convicted again and again of the grossest misrepresentation, the most disgraceful ignorance of Greek; in short, after he has, in the opinion of every impartial and competent judge of ecclesiastical antiquity, received from Bishop Horsley the severest castigation which a rash and arrogant invader of another's province ever received in the fields of controversy."—*Lon. II. PRIESTLEY THE NATURAL PHILOSOPHER.

"To enumerate Dr. Priestley's discoveries would in fact be to enter into a detail of most of those that have been made within the last fifteen years. How many invisible fluids whose existence evaded the sagacity of foregoing ages has he made known to us! The very air we breathe he has taught us to analyze, to examine, to improve; a substance so little known that even the precise effect of respiration was an enigma until he explained it. He first made known to us the proper food of vegetables, and in what the difference between these and animal substances consisted. To him pharmacy is indebted for the method of making artificial waters, as well as for a shorter method of preparing other medicines, metallurgy for more powerful and cheap solvents, and chemistry for such a variety of discoveries as it would be tedious to recite,—discoveries which have new-modelled the science, and drawn to it and to this country the attention of all Europe. It is certain that since the year 1773 the eyes and regards of all the learned bodies of Europe have been directed to this country by his means. In every philosophical treatise his name is to be found, and in almost every page. They all own that most of their discoveries are due either to the repetition of his discoveries or to the hints scattered through his works."—DR. RICHARD KIRWAN.

"In his scientific career his object was uniformly to question nature by every possible experimental investigation, and to state his results as he obtained them. He laid the basis of the chemistry of the gases, and of those modes of investigation in the pneumatic branch of the science which are still pursued. He discovered a great variety of facts in this department of the science. To him we are indebted for the knowledge of oxygen, binoxide of nitrogen, sulphurous acid, fluosilicic acid, muriatic acid, ammonia, carburetted hydrogen, and carbonic acid."—DR. R. D. THOMSON.

"Though his chemical experiments were for the most part accurate, they did not exhibit that precise chemical knowledge which distinguished the experiments of some of his contemporaries. He never attempted to discover the constituents of his gases, nor their specific gravity, nor any other numerical result."—DR. THOMAS THOMSON.

He entered the laboratory with but little preparation:

"When I began my experiments," he remarks, "I knew very little of chemistry, and had, in a manner, no idea of the subject before I attended a course of lectures at an academy where I taught."

As late as 1795, the year after his refusal of the professorship of chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania, he observes, in a letter,

"As to chemical lectureship, I am now convinced I could not have acquitted myself in it to proper advantage. . . . Though I have made many discoveries in some branches of chemistry, I never gave much attention to the common routine of it, and know but little of the common processes."

"He had great merit in the contrivance of his apparatus, which was simple and neat to a degree that has never been equalled, and the indefatigable industry with which he pursued his researches would entitle him to still higher praise if he had combined with it the patience and forecast by which so much labour may be saved. The truth is, however, that he was always too much occupied with making experiments to have leisure either to plan them beforehand with philosophic precision, or to combine their results afterwards into systematic conclusions. He was so impatient to be doing that he could spare no time for thinking, and erroneously imagined that science was to be forwarded rather by accumulating facts than by meditating on those that were ascertained."—LORD JEFFREY: Edin. Rev., Oct. 1806, ix. 150.

"On the whole, from Dr. Priestley's conversation, and from his writings, one is not much disposed to consider him as a person of first-rate abilities. The activity rather than the force of his genius is the object of admiration. He is indefatigable in making experiments, and he compensates by the numbers of them for the unskilfulness with which they are often contrived. Though little skilled in mathematics, he has written on optics with tolerable success; and though but moderately versed in chemistry, he has done very considerable service to that science."—PROFESSOR JOHN PLAYFAIR.

"The merit of Dr. Priestley, as a cultivator of science, was the activity with which he made experiments,—the watchful attention with which he observed every phenomenon, following the minutest circumstances of each process,—the versatility with which he prosecuted each new idea that arose from his trials,—his diligence in recording all the particulars, as if well aware how much depends in every branch of inductive philosophy upon allowing no fact to escape, when we are confessedly in want of light, and can never tell how any given fact may bear on the unknown conclusion to which our analytical process is leading us. As a reasoner, his powers were far less considerable. He possessed not the sound judgment, the large circumspection, which enables men to weigh the relative value of either reasons or facts."—LORD BROUGHAM: Philos., &c., 78, 79. See, also, 70, 75, 76.

III. PRIESTLEY THE MORAL PHILOSOPHER.

"Dr. Priestley's metaphysical creed embraces four leading doctrines: he adopted the theory of vibrations, the association of ideas, the scheme of philosophical necessity, and the soul's materiality. On all these topics he has furnished us with extended dissertations; and, whatever opinions may be entertained of any or all of them, there are few persons but will readily admit that the Doctor has displayed both great zeal and great ability in defence of them. . . . Dr. Priestley is Dr. Reid's most able and popular opponent."—BLAKEY: Hist. of Philos. of Mind, iii. 202, 303.

"Both Priestley and Brown strenuously contend against Reid's interpretation of the doctrine of Locke, who states it as that philosopher's opinion 'that images of external objects were conveyed to the brain; but whether he thought with Descartes [lege omnino Dr. Clarke] and Newton, that the images in the brain are perceived by the mind, there present, or that they are imprinted on the mind itself, is not so evident.' This, Brown, Priestley, and others, pronounce a flagrant misrepresentation."—SIR WM. HAMILTON: Lects. on Metaphysics, 1859, Lect. XXII.

"Joseph Priestley criticised at the same time both Hume and his antagonists. He may be said to have been more successful with the latter, whose instinctive principles he justly styled qualitates occultæ. In opposition to Hume he alleged a proof of the existence of the Divinity, which was untenable. He was a rank Determinist, and, consistently with his principles, controverted, as Hartley had done, the doctrine of free agency, and endeavoured to establish a system of materialism like that advocated by his predecessor."—Tenneman's Hist. of Philos., Johnson's trans., 383.

"Neglecting all the presumptions for a future state, afforded by a comparison of the course of human affairs with the moral judgments and moral feelings of the human heart, and overlooking, with the same disdain, the presumptions arising from the narrow sphere of human knowledge, when compared with the indefinite improvement of which our intellectual powers seem to be susceptible, this acute but superficial writer attached himself exclusively to the old and hackneyed pneumatological argument; tacitly assuming as a principle that the future prospects of man depend entirely on the determination of a physical problem, analogous to that which was then dividing chemists about the existence or non-existence of phlogiston. In the actual state of science, these speculations might well have been spared."—DUGALD STEWART: Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., 58.

"Priestley's mind was objective to an extreme: he could fix his faith upon nothing which had not the evidence of sense in some way or other impressed upon it. Science, morals, politics, philosophy, religion, all came to him under the type of the sensational. The most spiritual ideas were obliged to be cast into a material mould before they could commend themselves to his judgment or conscience. His intellect was rapid to an extraordinary degree; he saw the bearings of a question according to his own principles at a glance, and embodied his thoughts in volumes whilst many other men would hardly have sketched out their plan. All this, though admirable in the man of action, was not the temperament to form the solid metaphysician; nay, it was precisely opposed to that deep reflective habit, that sinking into one's own inmost consciousness, from which alone speculative philosophy can obtain light and advancement."—Morell's Hist. of Mod. Philos., i. 142–143.

We have quoted Professor Playfair's opinion of Priestley as a natural philosopher: this eminent scholar continues:

"If we view him as a critic, a metaphysician, and a divine, we must confine ourselves to a more scanty praise. In his controversy with Dr. Reid, though he has said many things that are true, he has shown himself wholly incapable of understanding the principal point in debate; and when he affirmed [see HARTLEY, DAVID, M.D., p. 795, ante] that the vague and unsatisfactory speculations of Hartley have thrown as much light on the nature of man as the reasonings of Sir Isaac Newton did on the nature of the body, he can hardly be allowed to understand in what true philosophy consists. As to his theology, it is enough to say that he denies the immateriality of the soul, though he contends for its immortality and ranges himself on the side of Christianity. These inconsistencies and absurdities will perhaps deprive him of the name of a philosopher, but he will still merit the name of a useful and diligent experimenter."

PRIESTLEY THE MAN.

"His character is a matter of no doubt, and it is of a high order. That he was a most able, most industrious, most successful student of nature is clear; and that his name will forever be held in grateful remembrance by all who cultivate physical science, and placed among those of its most eminent masters, is unquestionable. That he was a perfectly conscientious man in all the opinions which he embraced, and sincere in all he published respecting other subjects, appears equally beyond dispute. He was also upright and honourable in all his dealings, and justly beloved by his family and friends as a man spotless in all the relations of life. That he was governed in his public conduct by a temper too hot and irritable to be consistent either with his own dignity or with an amiable deportment, may be freely admitted; and his want of self-command, and want of judgment in the practical affairs of life, was manifest above all in his controversial history; for he can be charged with no want of prudence in the management of his private concerns. His violence and irritability, too, seem equally to have been confined to his public life, for in private all have allowed him the praise of a mild and attractive demeanour; and we have just seen [interview with a Calvinistic divine in Pennsylvania] its great power in disarming the prejudices of his adversaries."—LORD BROUGHAM: Philos., &c., 89–90. See, also, 69, 85, 86.

"In the domestic relations of life he was uniformly kind and affectionate; his parental feelings were those of the tenderest and best of fathers; and not even malice itself could ever fix a stain upon his private conduct, or impeach his integrity."—DR. AIKIN: quoted in Encyc. Brit., 9th ed., xviii., 1859, Life of Priestley.

"I have lived much among the friends of Priestley, and learned from them many peculiar opinions of that man, who speaks all he thinks. No man has studied Christianity more, or believes it more sincerely."—Robert Southey, to John May, June 26, 1797: Southey's Life and Corresp., chap. v.

"Dr. Priestley, after he had abjured the Holy Ghost, and satisfied himself that Jesus Christ was nothing more than a man, that the scriptural writers were no more inspired than himself, and that the soul of man had no existence, retained the same devout passion for preaching, praying, and catechising, which he acquired while he believed in the Trinity and the immateriality of the sentient principle of his nature. . . . We have already said that we believe him to have been sincere in the singular profession of faith which he promulgated; and therefore we are constrained to respect his endeavours to confirm and recommend it. But it is impossible not to regret the presumption and infatuation by which he seems to have been guided; and we are afraid that the theological speculations of a man of great learning, sagacity, industry, and devotion, are at this day an offence to the serious, and a jest to the profane."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Rev., Oct. 1806, ix. 137, 161.

"Priestley was a good man, though his life was too busy to leave him leisure for that refinement and ardour of moral sentiment which have been felt by men of less blameless life. Frankness and disinterestedness in the avowal of his opinion were his point of honour. In other respects his morality was not brilliant. But the virtue of the sentimental moralist is so overprecarious and ostentatious, that he can seldom be entitled to look down with contempt on the steady though homely morals of the household."—Sir J. Mackintosh, Sept. 13, 1807, Life, i., chap. vii.

Dr. Johnson's verdict on Priestley's theological writings has been already cited in this article: his opinion of his probity and learning will be found in our notice of Rev. Samuel Badcock, (p. 98, ante;) and an amusing instance of the triumph of the lexicographer's candour over his prejudices with respect to the same obnoxious philosopher is recorded in the 77th chapter of Boswell's memoir. Mathias's unfavourable comments (in Pursuits of Lit., Dialogue First, &c.) have also been already noticed in this article. A lively sketch of Priestley as a man, a theologian, and a philosopher occurs in the London Quarterly Review for Dec. 1812, 425–431; and one far less temperate in tone appeared in Blackwood's Magazine for Sept. 1835, 362–365. From the latter we quote a few lines more commendable for vigour of style than politeness of language:

"A man frenzied for novelty, ambitious of a name, precipitate in the publication of every change of a capricious mind, and utterly careless of the mischief effected by his unprincipled notoriety. As a scholar shallow, as a philosopher empirical, as a politician malcontent, and as a religionist heretical, he has long since sunk into the contempt which every man of sense feels for pretensions without solidity, and the desire of public mischief defeated only by giddy impotence of mind."—362. See, also, Blackw. Mag., April, 1839, *482.

Who would believe, save one whose business it is to find all that has been said on both sides of a question, that this is the man whom the learned editor of Bellenden thus eulogizes?

"Let not his attainments be depreciated, because they are numerous without a parallel; let not his talents be ridiculed, because they are superlatively great; let not his morals be vilified, because they are correct without austerity, and exemplary without ostentation; because they present, even to common observers, the innocence of a hermit and the simplicity of a patriarch, and because a philosophic eye will at once discover in them the deep-fixed root of virtuous principle and the solid trunk of virtuous habit."—Dr. Parr's Letter from Irenopolis.

The eloquent commendation of Robert Hall will have more weight with most readers than the eulogy just quoted:

"The religious tenets of Dr. Priestley appear to me erroneous in the extreme; but I should be sorry to suffer any difference of sentiment to diminish my sensibility to virtue or my admiration of genius. His enlightened and active mind, his unwearied assiduity, the extent of his researches, the light he poured into almost every department of science, will be the admiration of that period, when the greater part of those who have favoured or those who have opposed him will be alike forgotten. Distinguished merit will ever rise superior to oppression, and will draw lustre from reproach. The vapours which gather round the rising sun, and follow in its course, seldom fail at the close of it to form a magnificent theatre for its reception, and to invest with variegated tints, and with a softened effulgence, the luminary which they cannot hide."

For this admirable evidence of generous candour Mr. Hall did not escape censure; and of this he was informed by an acquaintance in the course of conversation, (see Gardiner's Music and Friends:) the great man listened to the grave indictment, and thus answered if in a spirit which will be honoured so long as bigotry is sensible of shame, or charity holds alliance with virtue:

"Dr. Priestley, it is acknowledged, was a Socinian; but it was not under that character he was eulogized. It was as the friend of liberty, the victim of intolerance, and the author of some of the most brilliant philosophical discoveries of modern times, for which he was celebrated throughout Europe, and his name enrolled as a member of the most illustrious institutions: so that my eulogy was but a feeble echo of the applause which resound from every civilized portion of the globe. And are we suddenly fallen back into the darkness and ignorance of the middle ages, during which the spell of a stupid and unfeeling uniformity bound the nations in iron slumber, that it is become a crime to praise a man for talents which the whole world admire, and for virtues which his enemies confessed, merely because his religious creed was erroneous? If any thing could sink orthodoxy into contempt, it would be its association with such gothic barbarity of sentiment, such reptile manners."

In 1860 a committee was formed for the erection of a portrait-statue of Dr. Priestley among the distinguished men of science in the corridor of the new museum at Oxford.

Prime, A. J., M.D., son of Nathaniel S. Prime, D.D., (infra,) b. on Long Island, 1810, graduated at Williams College, Mass., 1829, is a frequent contributor to periodicals. He is known as a zealous student of Natural History.

Prime, Benjamin Young, M.D., 1733–1791, a native of Huntington, Long Island, a son of Rev. Ebenezer Prime, graduated at Nassau Hall, Princeton, N. Jersey, 1751, and subsequently took his medical degree at Leyden, on which occasion he delivered a Dissertation in Latin, which was pub. there in 4to. He subsequently wrote essays, &c., in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, and Spanish, and many Revolutionary songs and ballads which circulated widely during the war. Among his publications were: 1. The Patriot Muse; or, Poems on some of the Principal Events of the Late War, &c., by an American, Lon., 1764, 8vo. 2. Columbia's Glory; or, British Pride Humbled: a Poem on the American Revolution, (N. York,) 1791. Recently a collection of some of his pieces in various languages has been pub., viz. 3. Muscipula Cambryomachia, Newburgh, 1838. The principal Latin poem in this vol. is probably not Dr. Prime's; but the translation is doubtless his work. See Griswold's Curiosities of Amer. Lit.; Duyckinck's Cyc. of Amer. Lit., i. 433–434; Sprague's Annals, Presbyterian, iii., 1858, 31–32.

Prime, Ebenezer, 1700–1779, father of the preceding, was a Presbyterian divine of Huntington, Long Island, where he died in the sixty-first year of his ministry at that place. He pub. a Discourse on the Nature of Ordination, and several sermons, of which the titles are unknown. See Sprague's Annals, Presbyterian, iii., 1858, 30–35, (Letter by his great-grandson, Samuel Irenæus Prime, D.D., infra.)

Prime, Edward Dorr Griffin, son of Nathaniel S. Prime, D.D., (infra,) b. at Cambridge, New York, 1814, graduated at Union College, N. York, 1832, studied theology at Princeton, N. J., was American chaplain at Rome in 1855, and has been for some years one of the editors of the N. Y. Observer, in which his letters under the signature of Eusebius have attracted considerable attention.

Prime, Nathaniel Scudder, D.D., 1785–1856, son of Benjamin Young Prime, M.D., (supra,) and a native of Huntington, Long Island, graduated at Nassau Hall, Princeton, N. Jersey, 1804, was licensed in the Presbyterian Church, 1805, and was subsequently stationed at Sag Harbour, Freshpond, Smithtown, Cambridge, (New York,) and other places. He also acted as principal of literary institutions at Cambridge, Sing Sing, and Newburgh, and gained distinction as a teacher. This useful and excellent man died suddenly at Mamaroneck, N. Jersey. A notice of his services and publications, and a tribute to his memory, will be found in Sprague's Annals, Presbyterian, iii., 1858, 32, n. He pub. three single Sermons, 1811, '17, '25; an Address, 1815; Charge to the Rev. Samuel Irenæus Prime, (infra,) 1837; many statistical and other articles in periodicals; and the two following works: 1. A Familiar Illustration of Christian Baptism, 1818, 12mo. In this work he defends infant baptism. 2. A Hist. of Long Island from its First Settlement by the Europeans to the Year 1845, N. York and Pittsburgh, 1845, 12mo.

"He had a mind of uncommon force and discrimination; a noble and generous spirit; simple and engaging manners; an invincible firmness in adhering to his own convictions; an earnest devotion to the best interests of his fellow-men; an excellent talent for the pulpit; great tact at public business; and a remarkably graceful facility at mingling in a deliberate body." —Dr. Spring, ubi supra.

Prime, Samuel Irenæus, D.D., son of the preceding, b. at Ballston, N. York, 1812; graduated at Williams College, Mass., 1829; studied theology at Princeton, N. Jersey, and preached for one year at Ballston Spa, and subsequently officiated for three years at a parish on the Hudson opposite Newburgh; retired from active ministerial labour in consequence of the failure of health, and in 1840 became connected with the New York Observer, of which he has been for about twenty years one of the editors and proprietors. Dr. Prime has pub. about twenty-five vols. anonymously, and a number of others with his name. Among those acknowledged by him are: 1. The Old White Meeting-House, or Reminiscences of a Country Congregation, N. York, 1845, 18mo. Several edits. 2. Life in New York, 1845. Several edits. 3. Prince, Thomas. The Silken Independent's Snare Broken, Lon., 1649, 4to.

Prince, Thomas, 1687–1771, a native of Sandwich, Mass., a grandson of John Prince, of Hull, England, who emigrated to America in 1633, graduated at Harvard College, 1707; visited Europe in 1709, and preached for several years at Combs, in Suffolk, and at other places; returned to Boston, July, 1717, and was ordained co-pastor of the Old South Church, (Dr. Joseph Sewall being his colleague,) Oct. 1, 1718. He retained this connection until his death, varying ministerial duties with historical investigations. His valuable collection of books, and some of his MSS., (many were destroyed by the British during the Revolutionary War,) are preserved in the library of the Massachusetts Historical Society. In addition to the historical work by which he is best known, he pub. twenty-nine single Sermons, 1717–56; Two Serms. on the Earthquake, 1727; An Account of the First Appearance of the Aurora Borealis; Account of English Ministers at Martha's Vineyard, appended to Experience Mayhew's Indian Converts, 1727, 8vo; Earthquakes of N. England, 1755; New England Psalm Book, Revised and Improved, 1758, 12mo. See, also, MASON, MAJOR JOHN, (p. 1237, supra.) Of his Chronological History of New England in the form of Annals, &c., vol. i., 8vo, was pub., Boston, 1736, 8vo; Nos. 1, 2, and 3, 32 pp. each, of vol. ii., appeared in 1755. The period contemplated by Prince was to include from 1602 to 1730; but his last number comes no lower than 1633. A new ed., containing all that Prince published, (edited by Nathan Hale,) was issued in 1826, 8vo, pp. 439.

"Of the New England Chronology so far as it extends there has been no difference of opinion. It is distinguished for its accuracy and extreme caution. . . . It is therefore a work of the greatest utility, and almost necessary to one who would form an intimate acquaintance with the history of the first planting of New England."—N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1826, 463–465; notice of ed. of 1826.

See, also, N. Amer. Rev., April, 1838, 477. Prince's elaborate introduction contains a chronological record of events from the Creation of the World to the Settlement of America. Portions of his work were repub. in 6th ed. of Morton's New England Memorial, 1855, 8vo. After Prince's death, Dr. John Erskine of Edinburgh pub. Six Serms. from his MSS., 1785. We trust that the Prince Society of Mutual Publication, established in Boston, June, 1858, (see Hist. Mag., N. York, Aug. 1858, 237, 256,) will publish his Diary and other MSS. of his which have never yet seen the light. Pringle, Sir John, 1707–1782, a native of Roxburghshire, Scotland, received his early education in the University of St. Andrew's, from whence, in 1727, he removed to Edinburgh for the study of physic, and subsequently continued his investigations at Leyden (where he was made Doctor of Physic in 1730) and at Paris. Returning to Edinburgh, he commenced the practice of medicine, and was in 1734 appointed co-professor (with Mr. Scott) of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh; in 1742 Physician to the Earl of Stair, and to the military hospital in Flanders; Physician-General to H. M. Forces in the Low Countries, 1743; Physician to the Home Army, 1745–46; abroad with the army on the Continent, 1747–48; settled in London, 1748; one of the Council of the Royal Society, 1753; President of the Royal Society, 1772–78; Physician-Extraordinary to George III., 1714; removed to Edinburgh in the spring of 1781, but returned to London in September of the same year, and died there on the 18th of January following. For a detailed account of the honours, domestic and foreign, which rewarded the merits of this eminent physician, and for notices of his publications, see his life, by Andrew Kippis, D.D., prefixed to Six Discourses delivered by Sir John Pringle, Bart., when President of the Royal Society, &c., [originally pub. separately, 1774–78,] Lon., 1783, 8vo. See, also, Weld's Hist. Roy. Soc.; Hutton's Philos. Dict.; Eloge de M. Pringle, by Condorcet, Œuvres Complètes, tom. ii. 226–247; Boswell's Life of Johnson; Watt's Bibl. Athen., 1859, ii. 181, 211. In addition to his valuable Discourses, we notice: 1. Disputatio de Marcore Senili, Leyd., 1730, 4to; Lon., 1765, 8vo: Inaug. Dissert. 2. Observations on the Nature and Cure of Hospital and Jail Fevers, in a Letter to Dr. Mead, 1750, 8vo. Two edits. It appears in an improved shape as 7th chap., Pt. 3, of—3. Observations on the Diseases of the Army in Camp and in Garrison, Lon., 1752, '53, '61; 4th ed., 1765, 4to; 6th ed., 1768, 8vo; 7th ed., 1775, 8vo; 8th ed., 1810, 8vo. Also trans. into French, German, and Italian. This admirable work can be understood by any intelligent layman, and should be in the hands of every soldier, until the happy day when both physic and soldiers are unknown. Haller, in referring to the production, designates the author as "vir illustris, de omnibus bonis artibus bene meritus."

Pringle, Thomas, 1789–1834, a native of Blaiklaw, Teviotdale, Scotland, had the misfortune in infancy to dislocate his hip-joint, in consequence of which he was obliged to carry crutches for life. About 1796 he entered the University of Edinburgh, and on the completion of his studies became a clerk to the Commissioners on the Public Records of Scotland. In 1811, in conjunction with a friend, he pub. a poem called The Institute; in 1816 was a contributor to Albyn's Anthology and to the Poetic Mirror,—in which he printed a poem composed in imitation of the style, and which secured the praise and friendship, of Sir Walter Scott; in 1817 became co-editor with James Cleghorn of the Edinburgh Monthly Magazine, (after No. vi. styled Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine,) and in the same year was connected editorially with the Edinburgh Star (semi-weekly) newspaper, and Constable's Edinburgh (formerly The Scots) Magazine; in 1820, in company with twenty-three others, including his father and his two brothers, emigrated to South Africa, and there (at Cape Town) kept a school and published and edited the South African Journal, and edited the South African Commercial Advertiser, until they were discontinued in consequence of difficulties with the Governor; returned to London in 1826, became editor of Friendship's Offering, and (in 1827) Secretary to the Anti-Slavery Society, which office he retained until the abolition of slavery in the West Indies, June 27, 1834, less than six months before his death. Pringle gave to the world the following volumes. 1. Some Account of English Settlers in Albany, South Africa, Lon., 1824, 12mo.

"It is impossible to read without the deepest sympathy this authentic narrative."—Lon. Month. Rev., civ. 334.

2. Ephemerides; or, Occasional Poems, 1828, 12mo. 3. Teviotdale, and other Poems, 12mo. 4. African Sketches, 1834, med. 8vo and 12mo. The first part is composed of poetical sketches (some of which had been previously published) descriptive of African scenery, animals, and customs. The second part is a prose narrative of the trials of a colonist. A review of the work, with a biographical account of Pringle, written, we believe, by J. G. Lockhart, appeared in the London Quarterly Review, Dec. 1835, 74–85. See, also, Lon. Athen., 1834, 361.

"A very interesting and useful work."—WM. ALLEN: Journal, 6 mo. 19, 1834.

"It contains much graceful and simple poetry: . . . the second part is full of life and nature."—Athen., ut supra.

"What strikes us as most remarkable in Pringle's poetry is its almost constant elegance. . . . His prose sketches are extremely good."—Quar. Rev., ut supra.

5. Narrative of a Residence in South Africa, 1835, p. 8vo; new ed., 1840, r. 8vo; again, 1848. In 1838 appeared—and to this book we refer the reader—6. Prinsep, James, 1800–1840, a native of England, went out to the East Indies at an early age in the service of the East India Company in the Mint department, and was for ten years Assay Master of Benares, where he collected the materials for his graphic Sketches of Benares; was subsequently transferred to the Mint at Calcutta, and became Secretary to the Physical Class of the Asiatic Society, and editor of the Gleanings in Science, which he remodelled, in 1832, under the title of the Journal of the Asiatic Society; in 1832 succeeded H. H. Wilson as Secretary to the Asiatic Society. He pursued his investigations into chemistry, mineralogy, Indian numismatics and antiquities,—especially the deciphering of inscriptions,—until his constitution sank under the pressure. We are pleased to observe that Mr. Edward Thomas, late of the Bengal Civil Service, has recently published a collection of Prinsep's Essays on Indian Antiquities, Historic, Numismatic, and Palæographic, with his Useful Tables illustrative of Indian History, Coinages, Weights, Measures, &c., with Notes and Additions by the editor, 1858, 2 vols. 8vo, 53 plates, £2 2*s*. 6*d*. Every student of Indian history must have these volumes, which "form a complete Chronology of India, based upon the most authentic records, viz., the Coins of all the rulers. An eminent critic regrets that Goldsmith's Life was not written by Johnson: he adds,

"Goldsmith, however, has been fortunate in his biographers. Within a few years his life has been written by Mr. Prior, by Mr. Washington Irving, and by Mr. Forster. The diligence of Mr. Prior deserves great praise; the style of Mr. Washington Irving is always pleasing; but the highest place must, in justice, be assigned to the eminently interesting work of Mr. Forster."—Lord Macaulay: Life of Goldsmith, in *Encyc. Prior, Matthew, July 21, 1664–Sept. 18, 1721, a native of Abbot Street, one mile from Wimborne Minster, Dorsetshire, on the death of his father was adopted by his uncle, Samuel Prior, landlord of the Rummer Tavern, at Charing Cross, who sent him for some time to Dr. Busby at Westminster School, and then removed him to the tap-room, with the hope that the youth would take a lively interest in supplying the wants of the gentlemen of fashion and letters who patronized this respectable "public." But better things were in store for the youth, who had already contracted an intimacy with the classics which was destined to serve him in good stead. If Horace has lured many a man into the tavern, it must not be denied that he took one out. The story runs as follows:

"At leisure moments he pursued the study of the classics, on which account he was soon noticed by the polite company who resorted to his uncle's house. It happened one day that the Earl of Dorset and other gentlemen being at this tavern, the discourse turned upon a passage in an ode of Horace, who was Prior's favourite author; and the company being divided in their sentiments, one of the gentlemen said, 'I find we are not like to agree in our criticisms; but if I am not mistaken, there is a young fellow in the house who is able to set us all right.' Upon which he named Matt. Prior, who, being called in, gave the company the satisfaction they wanted. Lord Dorset, exceedingly struck with his ingenuity and learning, from that moment determined to remove him from the station he was in to one more suitable to his talents and genius; and accordingly procured him to be sent, in 1682, to St. John's College, in Cambridge, where he proceeded B.A. in 1686, and was shortly after chosen Fellow."

In 1687 he gained some reputation by his share in The Country Mouse and the City Mouse, folio, already noticed, (see MONTAGU, or MONTAGUE, CHARLES, Earl of Halifax,) a burlesque of Dryden's Hind and Panther, and about the same time he wrote his poem on The Deity, —an offering presented, according to the custom of his college, to the family of the Earl of Essex. His generous patron, Lord Dorset, still retained an interest in his welfare, and after the Revolution of 1688, by an introduction to the new court, placed him in the way to the successive promotions by which he was honoured. He was appointed Secretary to the English Embassy sent to the Congress at the Hague in 1690, and was shortly afterwards chosen a Gentleman of the Bedchamber by King William; presented the monarch with an Ode on the Death of Queen Mary, in 1695, folio, and with Verses on a Conspiracy against his Most Sacred Person, in 1696, folio; pub. his English Ballad in Answer to Mr. Despreaux's [Boileau's] Pindarique Ode on the Taking of Namur, 1695; Secretary to the English Embassy which concluded the peace of Ryswick, 1697, and in 1698 filled the same post at the court of France; Under-Secretary of State, 1699; a Commissioner of Trade, 1700, and in the same year published his Carmen Seculare, a panegyric on King William, folio; M.P. for East Grinstead, 1701, and shortly afterwards left the Whigs and joined the Tories; in 1704 pub. his Letter to Monsieur Boileau Despreaux, occasioned by the Victory at Blenheim, [Anon.,] folio; in 1706 gave to the world his ode (inscribed to Queen Anne) in honour of the battle of Ramillies; in 1707 (2d ed., 1709) pub. an octavo vol. of Poems, and in 1712, 8vo, Two Imitations of Chaucer; in July, 1711, sent privately to Paris with proposals of peace; returned with the Abbé Gaultier and M. Mesnager, French Plenipotentiary, and brought the English ministers and Mesnager together privately at his own house, Sept. 20th, 1711; with Bolingbroke at Paris, on diplomatic business connected with the conferences at Utrecht, Jan. 1712, and after his lordship's return acted as ambassador until August 1, 1714, when the Whigs succeeded the Tories in power; thrown into prison in 1715, on a charge of high treason, based on the secret interview above referred to, and remained in confinement for two years, (during which he wrote his poem of Alma,) when he was discharged without trial; pub. his poems (including Solomon) by subscription, 1718, folio, by which he gained four thousand guineas, to which an equal amount was added by Lord Harley for the purchase of Down Hall, which Prior was to enjoy for life; in 1720 pub., anonymously, his last work,—Conversation: a Tale, folio; died at Wimpole, a seat of the Earl of Oxford, (Harley's father,) in Cambridgeshire, September 18, 1721, and left £500 for a monument to be erected in Westminster Abbey. His last wish was religiously observed, and his diplomatic and poetical triumphs and historical aspirations have been preserved on the sepulchral marble by the classic pen of Robert Freind,—a gentleman to whom we have been obliged to administer a gentle correction on a preceding page, (170: BENTLEY, RICHARD, D.D.)

The collective edits., some with Memoir, of his Poetical Works, in addition to those above noticed, are: 1713, 12mo; 1720, 18mo, 1725, 3 vols. 12mo; 1733, 3 vols. 8vo; 1740, 8vo; 1751, 12mo; 1791, 2 vols. or. 8vo, (best of the old eds.: see Bibl. Anglo-Poet., No. 573;) 1784, 3 vols. 18mo; with Life by Mitford, 1835, 2 vols. 12mo, (Aldine ed., vols. xxxv., xxxvi.: repub., Boston, 1853, 2 vols. 12mo;) with Life and Crit. Notes by G. Gilfillan, 8vo. Also, Prior's Lyric Poems, 1741, being 24 Songs set to Music, 1741, 4to; Select Poems of Prior and Swift, 1853, 12mo. Of Prior's History of his Own Time, compiled from his Original MSS., Revised and Signed by Himself, and copied fair for the Press by Mr. Adrian Drift, (edited by J. Bancks,) 1740, 8vo, it is asserted that but little is really the poet's; and the work has always been treated with contempt. This vol. forms one of the two vols. 8vo entitled Prior's Miscellaneous Works, 1740. Of the folio ed. of his Poems pub. in 1718, there are three sizes. Solomon, in Latin, trans. by Wm. Dobson, (see Spence's Anecdotes by Singer,) was pub. separately, Oxon., 1736, 4to: Traduction à Geo. Bally, Camb., 1743, 4to. Gibbon (Decline and Fall, chap. lii., notes) calls Solomon a "verbose but eloquent poem."

"Prior," remarks his greatest biographer, "has written with great variety, and his variety has made him popular. He has tried all styles, from the grotesque to the solemn, and has not so failed in any as to incur derision or disgrace. His works may be distinctly considered as comprising Tales, Love-Verses, Occasional Poems, 'Alma,' and 'Solomon.' His Tales have obtained general approbation, being written with great familiarity and great sprightliness; the language is easy, but seldom gross, and the numbers smooth, without appearance of care. Of these tales there are only four. . . . I know not whether he be the original author of any tale which he has given us. . . . In his amorous effusions he is less happy; for they are not dictated by nature or by passion, and have neither gallantry nor tenderness. They have the coldness of Cowley without his wit, the dull exercises of a skilful versifier resolved at all adventures to write something about Chloe and trying to be amorous by dint of study. His fictions, therefore, are mythological. . . . The greatest of all his amorous essays is 'Henry and Emma,' a dull and tedious dialogue, which excites neither esteem for the man nor tenderness for the woman. . . . His occasional poems necessarily lose part of their value, as their occasions, being less remembered, raised less emotion. Some of them, however, are preserved by their inherent excellence. . . . 'Alma' is written in professed imitation of Hudibras, and has at least one accidental resemblance: Hudibras wants a plan, because it is left imperfect; 'Alma' is imperfect, because it seems never to have had a plan. Prior appears not to have proposed to himself any drift or design, but to have written the casual dictates of the present moment. . . . 'Alma' has many admirers, and was the only piece among Prior's works of which Pope said that he should wish to be the author. 'Solomon' is the work to which he intrusted the protection of his name, and which he expected succeeding ages to regard with veneration. His affection was natural: it had undoubtedly been written with great labour; and who is willing to think that he has been labouring in vain? He had infused into it much knowledge and much thought; had often polished it to elegance, often dignified it with splendour, and sometimes heightened it to sublimity: he perceived in it many excellences, and did not discover that it wanted that without which all others are of small avail,—the power of engaging attention and alluring curiosity. . . . The tediousness of this poem proceeds not from the uniformity of the subject; for it is sufficiently diversified; but from the continued tenour of the narration, in which Solomon relates the successive vicissitudes of his own mind, without the intervention of any other speaker, or the mention of any other agent, unless it be Abra; the reader is only to learn what he thought, and to be told what he thought wrong. The event of every experiment is foreseen, and therefore the process is not regarded. Yet the work is far from deserving to be neglected. He that shall peruse it will be able to mark many passages to which he may recur for instruction or delight; many from which the poet may learn to write, and the philosopher to reason. If Prior's poetry be generally considered, his praise will be that of correctness and industry, rather than of compass of comprehension or activity of fancy. He never made any effort of invention: his greater pieces are only tissues of common thoughts; and his smaller, which consist of light images or conceits, are not always his own. . . . What he has valuable he owes to his diligence and his judgment. His diligence has justly placed him among the most correct of the English poets; and he was one of the first that resolutely endeavoured at correctness. . . . His diction is more his own than that of any among the successors of Dryden; he borrows no lucky turns or commodious modes of language from his predecessors. His phrases are original, but they are sometimes harsh; as he inherited no elegance, none has he bequeathed. Of versification he was not negligent: what he received from Dryden he did not lose; neither did he increase the difficulty of writing by unnecessary severity, but uses triplets and Alexandrines without scruple. . . . His numbers are such as mere diligence may attain; they seldom offend the ear, and seldom soothe it; they commonly want airiness, lightness, and facility: what is smooth is not soft. His verses always roll, but they seldom flow. A survey of the life and writings of Prior may exemplify a sentence which he doubtless understood well, when he read Horace at his uncle's: 'the vessel long retains the scent which it first receives.' In his private relaxation he revived the tavern, and in his amorous pedantry he exhibited the college. But on higher occasions and nobler subjects, when habit was overpowered by the necessity of reflection, he wanted not wisdom as a statesman, or elegance as a poet."—Johnson's Lives of the English Poets, Cunningham's ed., 1854, iii. 219, 220, 221. 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227: where note especially Cowper's (Letters to Unwin) strictures on Johnson's Comments.

Charles James Fox (see Rogers's Recollections, 1859, 34) declared that the Doctor's treatment of Gray, Waller, and Prior—especially of Gray—was "abominable." Johnson's vigorous attack upon Prior as a composer of amatory poetry, and his unexpected and untenable defence of his volumes as "a lady's book," will be found in Boswell's life of the controversialist, edition of 1848, r. 8vo, the first on page 201, and the last on page 559.

"The best of what we copied from the Continental poets, on this desertion of our own great originals, is copied in the lighter pieces of Prior. That tone of polite raillery,—that airy, rapid, picturesque narrative, mixed up of wit and naïveté,—that style, in short, of good conversation, concentrated into flowing and polished verses,—was not within the vein of our native poets, and probably never would have been known among us if we had been left to our own resources. It is lamentable that this, which alone was worth borrowing, is the only thing which has not been retained. The tales and little apologues of Prior are still the only examples of this style in our language."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Rev., Aug. 1811, xviii. 281, and in his Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 380.

"Prior has left no single work equal to Gay's Fables or the Beggars' Opera. But in his lyrical and fugitive pieces he has shown even more genius, more playfulness, more mischievous gaiety. No one has exceeded him in the laughing grace with which he glances at a subject that will not bear examining, with which he gently hints at what cannot be directly insisted on, with which he half conceals and half draws aside the veil from some of the Muse's nicest mysteries. His Muse is, in fact, a giddy, wanton flirt, who spends her time in playing at snap-dragon and blindman's-buff, who tells what she should not, and knows more than she tells. She laughs at the tricks she shows us, and blushes, or would be thought to do so, at what she keeps concealed. . . . Some of Prior's bon-mots are the best that are recorded. His serious poetry, as his Solomon, is as heavy as his familiar style was light and agreeable."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the English Poets, Lect. VI. And see Blackw. Mag., ii. 683.

"Prior, lively, familiar, and amusing."—Smollett: Hist. of Eng.: George I., Notes.

"Prior was one of the last of the race of poets who relied for ornament on scholastic allusion and pagan machinery; but he used them, like Swift, more in jest than earnest, and with good effect. In his 'Alma' he contrives even to clothe metaphysics in the gay and colloquial pleasantry which is the characteristic charm of his manner."—Campbell's Specimens.

Cowper (letter to Unwin, March 21, 1784) refuses to believe that Alma was intended as an imitation of Hudibras. Alma, Mr. Rogers assures us, (Recollections, 61,) was a great favourite with C. J. Fox, who repeated many lines of it to his auditor.

"The whole poem, from beginning to end, is one continued piece of ridicule upon the various hypotheses of physiologists concerning the nature of the communication between soul and body. The amusing contrast between the solemn absurdity of these disputes and the light pleasantry of the excursions to which they lead the fancy of the poet, contributes the principal charm of this performance, by far the most original and characteristical of all Prior's Works."—Dugald Stewart: Dissert. First, Encyc. Brit., 8th ed., i. 70, n.

See, also, Blakey's Hist. Philos. of Mind, ii. 229. Mr. Moore's favourite piece is thus referred to in his Memoirs.

"Lord L[ansdowne] asked me what was the poem of Prior's I had often mentioned to him as very pretty; he had been often trying to recollect it. It was 'Dear Chloe, how blubbered,' &c., &c. We took it down and read it. Nothing can be more gracefully light and gallant than this little poem. I mentioned Lowth's objections to the last two lines as ungrammatical, correctness requiring 'than she' and 'than I;' but it is far prettier as it is."—Diary, Nov. 1818, vol. ii., 1853, 218.

"I believe that one chief reason for his [John Wesley's] high estimation of Prior among English poets was that he gives so many vivid sketches of man's wretchedness, in spite of all possible contrivances to enjoy life."—Robert Southey: Life of [John] Wesley, 3d ed., ii. 498.

Prior is a great favourite with one of the latest of our critics:

"Johnson speaks slightingly of his lyrics; but, with due deference to the great Samuel, Prior's seem to me among the easiest, the richest, the most charmingly humorous of English lyrical poems. Horace is always in his mind, and his song and his philosophy, his good sense, his happy easy turns and melody, his loves and his Epicureanism, bear a great resemblance to that most delightful and accomplished master."—Thackeray's Lects. on the English Humourists, Prior, Gay, and Pope, Lon., ed. 1858, 17.

See, also, N. York ed., (Charity and Humour,) 1858, 279.

Of the most famous of Prior's "loves," the less said the better. Cowper was a great admirer of the "charming case" of Prior's verse. We are told in Spence's Anecdotes that Prior was one of the nine "authorities for poetical language," selected with reference to the design of a new Dictionary, (before the appearance of Johnson's;) and in the same work it is remarked,

"There are but three poets who have any constant run of popularity now,—Pope, Prior, and Addison."

At the date at which we write, (1869,) the first only retains popularity; and, so long as men enjoy disquisitions on morals and strictures on manners, he is not likely to lose it. We have been obliged to hint at a serious defect of character in our poet, but we are more pleased to refer to a merit not always found among either poets or politicians, and Prior, we have seen, was both:

"Prior's writings evince less disposition to literary jealousy than those of any author of the age."—Sir Walter Scott: Life of Swift.

To this let it be added (it is by no means offered as a justification) that if Prior's morals were defective his manners were perfect, and that if he loved some "not wisely, but too well," he seems also to have successfully cultivated the affection of others who were more worthy of his esteem. Procter, Adelaide Anne, the daughter of Bryan Waller Procter, (infra,) b. in Bedford Square, London, Oct. 30, 1825, has long been known to many as the "golden-tressed Adelaide" of her father's beautiful poem, set to music by the Chevalier Neukomm, and doubtless sung by many who are now glad to sing Adelaide's own "Lyrics." Mr. Willis, who visited her father's mansion in Bedford Square in 1838, thus refers to the subject of this notice:

"A beautiful girl of eight or nine years, the 'golden-tressed Adelaide,' delicate, gentle, and pensive, as if she was born on the lip of Castaly, and knew she was a poet's child, completed the picture of happiness."—Pencillings by the Way.

After contributing poems to The Book of Beauty, 1843, and Household Words, 1853 et seq., Miss Procter gave to the world in May, 1858, fp. 8vo, a volume entitled Legends and Lyrics: A Book of Verses,—which was so well received that a second edition was issued in October, a third in February, and a fourth in December, 1859, and a ninth in 1865. Two editions were pub. in New York within a year,—1858, 12mo, 1859, 12mo; and several editions have appeared in Boston. See below.

"Seldom do we meet a collection of fugitive poems so pleasantly fulfilling friendly desire, and so able to bear the brunt of criticism, as this. There is reality in it. It is full of a thoughtful seriousness, a grave tenderness, a fancy temperate but not frigid, which will recommend themselves to every one who has a touch of the artist in his composition. The manner (and this is much to say) is not borrowed. Without any startling originality, it is Miss Procter's own; and not her father's; not Wordsworth's; not the Laureate's; not referable to the Brownings."—Lon. Athen., June 5, 1858, 712.

"This volume of Miss Procter's is without question the most promising of any first appearance in this century, except that of Keats."—Lon. Spectator, July, 1858.

"There is perhaps only one living poetess with whom she ought to fear competition."—Lon. Sat. Rev. See, also, N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1859, 255.

Ticknor & Fields also publish her Poetical Works, complete, 32mo, Blue and Gold, 1863; Poetical Works, complete, 16mo, Cabinet Edition, 1864. The Second Series was commended by Lon. Athen., Lit. Gaz., Spec., Critic, &c.

2. A Chaplet of Verses, Lon., 1862, sq. fp. 8vo. Published for the benefit of a Night Refuge. See Lon. Athen., 1862, i. 781. She edited Victoria Regia, Emily Faithfull & Co., Victoria Press, 1861, sup. r. 8vo, (2d 1000 in three weeks,) printed by women, and containing prose and poetical pieces by 58 contributors, (see Lon. Athen., 1861, ii. 463, 600, and 1862, i. 45;) commended by Lon. Times, Illust. Lon. News, Sat. Rev., &c. She contributed to this volume, and also to Good Words, All the Year Round, Cornhill Mag., and St. James's Mag. In 1851 she became a convert to and a devout member of the Roman Catholic Church, and exemplified her zeal not only in her poetry, but in the self-denying labours of love and works of mercy which—pursued "with a flushed earnestness that disregarded season, weather, time of day or night, food, rest"—hastened her to an early grave. She died Feb. 3, 1864. See notices of Miss Procter in Atlantic Monthly, Dec. 1865, (by Charles Dickens,) and The Month, Jan. 1866, Art. XI.

Procter, Bryan Waller, is better known as "Barry Cornwall," under which name (Barry Cornwall, Poet, is an imperfect anagram of Bryan Waller Procter) all his works have been given to the world. He was born in 1787, educated at Harrow School,—Lord Byron and Sir Robert Peel being his contemporaries at that seat of learning; passed some time in the office of a solicitor in Calne, Wiltshire; subsequently studied law in London, and was called to the Bar, as a member of Gray's Inn, in 1831. He held, for many years previous to his resignation in 1861, when he was succeeded by John Forster, (p. 616, supra,) who had before been Secretary to the Commission, a lucrative appointment in the court of Chancery as one of the Commissioners of Lunacy; was, we believe, born to a good estate, and certainly inherited a handsome legacy from his brother poet and friend, John Kenyon, (see p. 1025, supra.) Those who would see a portrait of Mr. Procter in his library must consult Mr. Willis's Pencillings by the Way, already referred to in this connection, (Procter, Adelaide Anne, supra.) See, also, Mr. H. T. Tuckerman's article, entitled Authors, in Harper's Monthly Magazine, May, 1858, 791. The following is a list of Barry Cornwall's publications. 1. Dramatic Scenes, and other Poems, Lon., 1819, 12mo; 2d ed., 1821, (last ed., including No. 3,) with Miscellaneous Poems. Now first printed, 1856, cr. 8vo; 57 Illustrations; Boston, 1857, 12mo, pp. 368.

Mr. Procter published this volume in order, he tells us, to "try the effect of a more natural style than that which had for a long time prevailed in our dramatic literature." How well he succeeded in his imitation of the elder dramatists may be judged of from the fact that Charles Lamb declared that there was not one of the Fragments to which, had he found them among the Garrick Plays in the British Museum, he would have refused a place in his Dramatic Specimens. We give some opinions on Dramatic Scenes, &c.

"I was mentioning the poems lately published by 'Barry Cornwall,' which had been sent to me by the author, and that, on calling at the publisher's to leave my card for him, I was told his real name was Procter, but that, 'being a gentleman of fortune, he did not like to have his name made free with in the reviews.' 'I suppose,' says Luttrell, 'he is of opinion qui non habet in crumena luat in corpore.' These poems, by-the-by, are full of original talent."—Thomas Moore: Diary, July 9, 1819: Memoirs, &c., 1853, ii. 337.

"None but a mind both of exquisite tact and original power could, in our belief, have created so many fine things in the very spirit of the old drama and of nature. . . . He looks on the feelings of our daily human life through the soft light of imagination, rendering them dearer, tenderer, and lovelier to his human heart. . . . If there be any trust in the fast-fulfilling promises of genius, we do not fear to see him, in good time, crowned with the world's applause."—Blackw. Mag., June, 1819, 310–316.

"A gentleman of the name of Cornwall, who has lately published a volume of Dramatic Scenes, . . . has made no sacrifice at the shrine of fashionable affectation or false glitter. There is nothing commonplace in his style to soothe the complacency of dulness, nothing extravagant to startle the grossness of ignorance. He writes with simplicity, delicacy, and fervour."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the Age of Elizabeth, Lect. VIII.

See, also, Edin. Rev., Jan. 1820, 155, (by Lord Jeffrey;) Lon. Lit. Gaz., 1819, 321.

"The 'Dramatic Scenes,' his earliest, is in several respects still his best work; for they were evident overflowings from his feelings and fancy, and are written con amore. Besides this, they had the charm of novelty, and bewitched all finer sensibilities by their being so thoroughly tinctured with 'Elysian beauty, melancholy grace.'"—Moir's Sketches of the Poet. Lit. of the Past Half-Century, 3d ed., 1856, 233.

"Œuvre facile et gracieuse, pleine de naturel et de vivacité."—Vapereau: Dict. univ. des Contemp., Paris, 1858, 1410.

To the last edition of Dramatic Scenes, 1856, (ut supra,) Mr. Procter prefixes the following explanatory observations and graceful valedictory:

"Of the following 'Dramatic Scenes,' some were written thirty and the others forty years ago: the first six Scenes (published in 1819 and 1820) being now materially altered and condensed. The Miscellaneous Poems, constituting 'Part the Third' in the present volume, have never before been printed. With the exception of three small pieces of verse, they bear date many years back. They have, however, been corrected, in some instances completed, more recently. In all probability, this work is the last with which I shall try the patience of the public.

"At one time I—in common with other lovers of the charming Art of Poesy—prepared myself to enter those lists where the Muses are said to award a wreath to each of the bolder combatants; but a long life of labour (my destiny) ensued,—presenting few intervals of leisure, and forcing my thoughts into another course.

"If years have not 'brought the philosophic mind,' they have at least quelled those aspirations which are troublesome only to the young; and I now feel that I ought to disburthen myself from my armour, and leave to more active and heroic spirits the glory of the struggle, and the crown that awaits success."

But as Mr. Procter in 1820 (Dedicatory Sonnet to a Sicilian Story, No. 2, infra) insinuated that perhaps he might write no more, and in 1831 (Preface to English Songs, No. 8, infra) made his parting bow to the public, we shall still hope for a few more "last appearances." A notice of the last edition of Dramatic Scenes will be found in the Lon. Athen., Dec. 13, 1856, 1528.

2. A Sicilian Story, with Diego de Mantilla, and other Poems, Lon., 1820, 12mo, pp. 180; 2d ed., 1821, 12mo.

"There is a great deal of the diction of Wordsworth and Coleridge, and some imitation of their beauties; but we think the natural bent of his genius is more like that of Leigh Hunt than any other author. . . . We hope that this is not to be our last meeting with Mr. Cornwall."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Rev., Jan. 1820, 33, 144–155.

"We know of no young poet in our day who stands in a more enviable state than Barry Cornwall. He has done nothing—and he has done much—that he may not easily excel, much that not many will easily equal. We must not, therefore, hear him speaking seriously of giving over before he has fairly begun: everybody seems to think kindly and hopefully of him; he has smoothed the face of periodical criticism till it has smiled; he has done more than that,—he has acquired the friendship of all true lovers of poetry."—Blackw. Mag., March, 1820, 645–650. See, also, Edin. Mon. Rev., iii. 271; Lon. Mon. Rev., xci. 291.

3. Marcian Colonna; an Italian Tale, with three Dramatic Sketches, and other Poems, 1820, 12mo, pp. 190. Reviewed in Edin. Mon. Rev., iv. 176.

"If it be the peculiar province of Poetry to give delight, this author should rank very high among our poets. And, in spite of his neglect of the terrible passions, he does rank very high, in our estimation. He has a beautiful fancy, and a beautiful diction, and a fine ear for the music of verse, and great tenderness and delicacy of feeling. He seems, moreover, to be altogether free from any tincture of bitterness, rancour, or jealousy, and never shocks us with atrocity, or stiffens us with horror, or confounds us with the dreadful sublimities of demoniacal energy. His soul, on the contrary, seems filled to overflowing with images of love, and beauty, and gentle sorrow, and tender pity, and mild and holy resignation. The character of his poetry is to soothe and melt and delight, to make us kind and thoughtful and imaginative, to purge away the dross of our earthly passions by the refining fires of a pure imagination, and to lap us up from the eating cares of life in visions so soft and bright as to sink like morning dreams on our senses, and at the same time so distinct and truly fashioned upon the eternal pattern of nature as to hold their place before our eyes long after they have again been opened on the dimmer scenes of the world."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Rev., Nov. 1820, xxxiv. 449–460.

In the concluding lines of this article, Lord Jeffrey announces the fact that Mr. Procter is employed upon the composition of "an entire tragedy." In the next year it was given to the world, under the title of—4. Mirandola; a Tragedy, 1821, 8vo, 3d ed. same year, and was performed at Covent Garden with great success. See Blackwood's Magazine, viii. 537, (by Dr. Maginn,) xi. 362; Lon. Mon. Rev., xciv. 189. 5. Poetical Works, 1822, 3 vols. 12mo; new ed., 1853, 3 vols. 12mo; N. York, 1856, 2 vols. sm. 8vo. 6. The Flood of Thessaly, The Girl of Provence, and other Poems, Lon., 1823, 8vo. This volume, censured with slight qualifications in Lon. Mon. Rev., ci. 50, was criticised with great severity in Blackwood's Magazine for May, 1823, xiii. 532–541. Indeed, Barry Cornwall had been out of favour in this quarter for some time past, and so continued: see vols. xi. 369; xii. 701; xiv. 491; xvi. 285–289; xvii. 369; xviii. 378; xxxviii. 71–83; xlv. 145–169, 539. If we add to the above, and the vols. before cited, vols. vi. 240, 246, xi. 115–116, (both commendatory,) xiii. 564, xxvii. 633, xxx. 663, xxxviii. 257, and vol. xix., Pref., xxvi., xxvii., (where North vindicates his assaults on the poet,) we refer to all the notices of our author in this famous periodical. 7. The book by its size and quality is the very thing for a solitary traveller on a summer ramble, who will find that Nature and Verse receive the last and most exquisite relish from being read in company."—*Lon. "Byron is a great admirer of the poetry of Barry Cornwall, which he says is full of imagination and beauty, possessing a refinement and delicacy, that whilst they add all the charms of a woman's mind take off none of the force of a man's. He expressed his hope that he would devote himself to tragedy, saying that he was sure he would become one of the first writers of the day."—The Countess of Blessington's Conversations with Lord Byron.

"He cannot be said to equal in energy the older writers who have been his models; but at times he approaches them very nearly in deep feeling, in true pathos, and in fine and delicate delineation of human character."—Mrs. Hall.

Mr. Moir quotes with great satisfaction the "just and proper précis of this poet's character, by Lord Jeffrey," (Edin. Rev., Nov. 1820, iii. 449–450,) which we have cited on a preceding page, and thus continues:

"To this I would only add, that if one of the surest tests of fine poetry—and I know no better—be that of impressing the heart and fancy, Barry Cornwall must rank high; for there are few to whose pages the young and ardent reader would more frequently and fondly recur, or which so tenderly impress themselves on the tablets of memory."—*Sketches of Poet. Prynne, William, 1600–1669, a native of Swainswick, near Bath; entered Oriel College, Oxford, 1616; took his degree of B.A. 1620; was called to the Bar in the Society of Lincoln's Inn, and became Bencher and Reader, but gave little time to the practice of the law, though he certainly studied its literature; was a great admirer of the Puritan Lecturer at Lincoln's Inn, Dr. John Preston, and excited the ire of Laud and some of the clergy by several theological tracts advocating doctrines not in favour with the dominant party; gave to the world in 1633, 4to, his Histrio-Mastix, for which, on the false charge that he intended to libel the queen, (who, six weeks after its publication, had appeared in a pastoral at Somerset House,) he was fined £5000, expelled from the University of Oxford and from Lincoln's Inn, degraded from the Bar, set twice on the pillory, lost both his ears, had his book burned before his eyes by the common hangman, and was sentenced to imprisonment for life; still kept up the fire at Archbishop Laud, and in 1636 enraged him by his News from Ipswich, (one sheet 4to,) for which the Star Chamber again fined him £5000, set him on the pillory, condemned him to close confinement for life in Caernarvon Castle, made the hangman hunt up and cut off what was left of his ears, and stamp him on both cheeks S. L., (intended by his amiable judges for "Schismatical Libeller," but translated by his unconquerable spirit "Stigmata Laudis,"—a better version: see BASTWICK, JOHN, M.D.; BURTON, HENRY;) in 1640 was released by a warrant from the Speaker of the House of Commons; was shortly afterwards made a Bencher of Lincoln's Inn; took his seat in Parliament as representative for Newport, and conducted the proceedings against Laud; was made Recorder of Bath in 1647, and in the next year zealously advocated a settlement between the king and the Parliament; immediately before the king's trial was ordered into custody, for "denying the supremacy of Parliament" in a pamphlet entitled A Briefe Memento, (1648, 4to, English: 1648, 4to, Latin;) Dec. 6, 1648, arrested by the army, and with others ejected from the House of Commons; attacked Cromwell and the army, and in consequence thereof was imprisoned in 1650, and again in 1651; dismissed from the Recordership of Bath in 1652, but re-elected after the Restoration; early in 1660 returned to the House of Commons as an excluded member, warmly urged the restoration of Charles II., and was elected in March, 1660, to the new Parliament as member for Bath.

"When the king was asked what should be done with Prynne to keep him quiet, 'Why,' said he, 'let him amuse himself with writing against the Catholics, and in poring over the records in the Tower.'"

Had Charles in his mind a passage between Henry VIII. and John Leland, the Prynne of a former generation? (See LELAND, JOHN, p. 1082, vol. i., supra.) Accordingly, Prynne was made Keeper of the Records in the Tower; but he had no idea of being "kept quiet," and, being again elected M.P. for Bath, in 1661, in July of that year incurred the censure of the House of Commons for what it denominated a seditious libel, being Sundry Reasons, &c. against the new Intended Bill for Governing and Reforming Corporations. The luckless scribe, whose strange fortune it was alternately to defend and attack and be attacked in return by every great party of his day, was reprimanded by the Speaker and threatened with expulsion and prosecution. In his earlier days, doubtless, the intrepid combatant of king, archbishop, Protector, peers, and parliaments would have been "eager for the fray;" but now he had "no stomach for the fight," and, whether it was that age had cooled his blood, argument convinced his reason, or the anticipated feast of Records bribed his integrity, confessing the alleged error and recanting his offensive language, he buried himself in his musty papers, forgot the faults of the living in chronicling the annals of the dead, and enriched the literature of his country with the most valuable of his many works, the Parliamentary Writs and the Chronological Records.

Thus death found him, and converted his life to history, whilst he was busily employed in instilling life into the forgotten history of those who had laboured and died before him.

The remembrance of his early days at Lincoln's Inn was perhaps still dear to him; for one of the last acts of his busy life was to endow the library of that respectable company with the fruits of—that is, the volumes achieved by—his literary industry. To this benefaction and the donor Wood thus refers in his account of the life and works of this great scribe:

"The books and little pamphlets that he wrote were theological, historical, political, controversial, &c., but very few of his own profession, all which are in number near 200, as the titles following show, bound up in about 40 volumes in fol. and qu. in Linc. Inn Library. To which an eminent sage of the law, [William Noy,] who had little respect for those published in his time, promised to give the works of John Taylor, the water poet, to accompany them. 'Twas not only he, but many others afterwards, especially royalists, that judged his books to be worth little or nothing, his proofs for no arguments, and affirmations for no testimonies, having several forgeries made in them for his and the ends of his brethren. They are all in the English tongue, and by the generality of scholars are looked upon to be rather rhapsodical and confused than any way polite or concise; yet for antiquaries, critics, and sometimes for divines, they are useful. In most of them he shows great industry, but little judgment, especially in his large folios against the pope's usurpations. He may be well intituled Voluminous Prynne, as Tostatus Albulensis was 200 years before his time called Voluminous Tostatus; for I verily believe that, if rightly computed, he wrote a sheet for every day of his life, reckoning from the time when he came to the use of reason and the state of man. His custom when he studied was to put on a long quilted cap which came an inch over his eyes, serving as an umbrella to defend them from too much light, and, seldom eating a dinner, would every three hours or more be munching a roll of bread, and now and then refresh his exhausted spirits with ale brought to him by his servant.

> "Thou that with ale or viler liquors
> Didst inspire Wythers, Prynne, and Vicars,
> And teach, though it were in despight
> Of nature and the stars, to write, &c.

"Thus Hudibras, part I. He was a right sturdy and doughty champion for the cause, a puritan beautifew, an inveterate enemy against the hierarchy of bishops, especially upon his imprisonment and sufferings for his Histrio-mastix, a busy, pragmatical, and meddling man without end, and one that had brought his body into an ill habit, and so consequently shortened his days, by too much action and concernment day and night."—Athen. Oxon., Bliss's ed., iii. 844–877, q. v.

We may quote some other opinions on Prynne before we have done; but we proceed just now to notice some of the many "books and little pamphlets" to which Anthony Wood, not the most lenient of judges when Presbyterians and Independents are at the bar, awards such limited, and that reluctant, commendation. 1. The Perpetuity of a Regenerate Man's Estate, Lon., 1627, 4to. His first publication. 2. The Vnlouelinesse of Love-lockes, 1628, 4to.

"Such erudition as Prynne's always retains its value:—the author who could quote a hundred authors on 'the unloveliness of love-locks' will always make a good literary chest of drawers, well filled, for those who can make better use of their contents than himself."—Disraeli's Miscell. of Lit., ed. 1853, 111.

4. Anti-Arminianisme, 1629; enlarged, 1630, 4to. 5. God no Impostor nor Deluder; or, An Answer to a Popish and Arminian Cavil, in the Defence of Free-Will and Universal Grace, 1630, 4to. 6. Histrio-Mastix: the Player's Scovrge or Actor's Tragœdie; wherein it is largely evidenced that popular Stage Plays (the very pompes of the Divell) are sinful, heathenish, lewde, ungodly Spectacles, and most pernicious Corruptions; and that the Profession of Play-Poets, of Stage-Players, with the penning, acting, and frequenting of Stage-Playes, are unlawful, infamous, and misbeseeming Christians; beside sundry other particulars concerning Dancing, Diceing, Health-drinking, &c., 1633, 4to, pp. 1050. This curious book has never been high in price: it is now worth about £1 10*s.* to £2 10*s.*, according to condition. J. Lilly's Bibl. Anglo-Curiosa, 1869, p. 105, £1 11*s.* 6*d.* Prynne cites, in favour of his positions, 55 synods and councils, 71 Fathers, 150 Protestant and R. Catholic writers, 40 heathen philosophers, and numerous other writers,—in all, it is computed, amounting to quite one thousand.

"He has, perhaps," remarks a critic, "quoted from three to four hundred authors on a single point."

The references, it is asserted, are over one hundred thousand in number. The work employed the author seven years, and was nearly four years in passing through the press. Among his complaints are the following:

"Some Play-Books, since I first undertook this subject, are grown from quarto into folio; which yet bear so good a price and sale, that, I cannot but with grief relate it, they are now printed in far better paper than most octavo or quarto Bibles, which hardly find such vent as they. . . . SHACKSPEER'S PLAIES are printed on the best crowne paper, far better than most Bibles. . . . Above 40,000 Play-bookes have been printed and vented within these two yeares."—Preface to the Christian Reader.

It is a curious fact that there was printed, and we presume performed, when Prynne was but ten years of age, a Comedy, author unknown, entitled Histriomastix; or, The Player Whipp'd, 1610, 4to. But Prynne, as we have seen by his title whips others besides players.

It was the complaint of Noy, the Attorney-General, in his speech against the book,

"He falleth on those things that have not relation to stage-plays;—musick in the church, dancing, new-year's gifts, &c; then upon altars, images, hair of men and women, bishops, and bonfires. Cards and tables do offend him, and poruke do fall within the compass of his theme."

Lord Cottington "carried the war into Africa" against the supposed author by affirming that Prynne never wrote the book alone: "he either assisted the devil," exclaimed his astonished lordship, "or was assisted by the devil." Secretary Cooke, however, was not disposed to travel beyond the record:

"By this vast book of Mr. Prynne's," he observed, "it appeareth that he hath read more than he hath studied, and studied more than he hath considered. He calleth his book 'Histriomastix;' but therein he showeth himself like unto Ajax Anthropomastix, as the Grecians called him, the scourge of all mankind; that is, the whipper and the whip."

The sentence awarded to the author has been already stated: the publisher was fined £500, and prohibited to print or sell books, and the licenser, who seems to have been sorely bewildered about the whole affair, was removed and punished. Hallam seems to pity Peter Heylin, Laud's chaplain,

"on whom the Archbishop devolved the burthen of reading this heavy volume in order to detect its offences. Heylin, a bigoted enemy of every thing puritanical, and not scrupulous as to veracity, may be suspected of having aggravated, if not misrepresented, the tendency of a book much more tiresome than seditious."—*Constit. The Antipathie of the English Lordly Prelacie both to Regall Monarchy and Civil Unity, 1641, 2 Pts., 4to.

"The last of this gang [defamers of the English bishops] was that eternal scribbler, William Prynne; who raked together all the dirt that had been thrown at any of our bishops by the most inveterate and implacable of all their enemies, and heaped it into a large dunghill-book."—*Bishop Nicolson's Eng. 37. The Substance of a Speech made in the House of Commons, touching the King's Answer to the Proposition of both Houses upon the whole Treaty, whether they are Satisfactory or Not Satisfactory, 1649, 4to. Prynne's explanatory appendix to this speech in favour of the king, (already referred to,) and the speech itself, are of great value to the historical student.

"In this calamitous state of things, the famous Prynne rose up in his place and delivered a speech in defence of the king's answer to the propositions of Parliament. Long as it is, I cannot but recommend it to an entire and attentive perusal. . . . You will see it in Cobbett, [Parl. Hist.: see COBBETT, WILLIAM.]

"Certainly a more striking exhibition of principle never occurred. Prynne was speaking in an assembly overawed by soldiers, in a situation that might have made a Roman shrink. Every reason that could irritate the heart of man concurred to make him inveterate against the king. He had to preface his arguments with relating what he had endured from him. . . . Yet did this virtuous man continue to reason out his conclusion, hour after hour, with the most patient and penetrating sagacity. . . . The subsequent events are but too well known. Cromwell and the army sent Colonel Pride to clear the house of all who were disposed to an accommodation with the king. The public execution of the sovereign followed. This cruel and dreadful outrage has given occasion to much reasoning with respect to the nature of government and the original grounds of civil obedience."—Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XVI.

Of the condemnation and execution of Charles, Mr. Hallam remarks,

"It was, as we all know, the act of a bold but very small minority, who, having forcibly expelled their colleagues from parliament, had usurped under the protection of a military force that power which all England reckoned illegal. . . . If it be alleged that many of the regicides were firmly persuaded in their consciences of the right and duty of condemning the king, we may surely remember that private murderers have often had the same apology."—Comstit. Hist. of Eng., 7th ed., 1854, ii. 226.

"In no long time," remarks another historian of our day, "it became manifest that those political and religious zealots to whom this deed [the execution of Charles] is to be ascribed, had committed not only a crime, but an error."—LORD MACAULAY: Hist. of Eng., vol. i. chap. i.

An Exact Abridgment of the Records in the Tower of London from the Reign of K. Edw. II. to K. Rich. III., &c., collected by Sir Robert Cotton, Knt., Revised, &c., 1657, fol.; 1658, fol.

"A good notion of the early constitutional history of England may be collected from Cotton's Abridgment of the Records, which ought by all means to be consulted. It has been edited by Prynne, whose preface should be perused. . . . Cotton is, of course, no authority in Westminster Hall or Parliament."—Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. V.

47. Ten Queries concerning Tithes, 1659, 4to. See quotation from Milton, infra. 48. Remainder of a Gospel Plea for the Tithes, &c., 1659. Considered one of his best. 49. The First Tome of an Exact Chronological Vindication and Historical Demonstration of our British, Roman, Saxon, Danish, Norman, English Kings' Supreme Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in and over all Spiritual Affairs, Causes, Persons, as well as Temporal, within their Realms of England, Scotland, Ireland, and other Dominions; from the Original Planting, Embracing of Christian Religion therein, and Reign of Lucius, our first Christian King, till the Death of King Richard I., A.D. 1199. Wherein, &c., 1666, fol. This has long been known as vol. i. (vol. iv., supra, is properly vol. i.) of Prynne's Records. The Second Tome, (A.D. 1199–1273,) vol. ii. of Prynne's Records, was pub. 1665, fol. The History of King John, King Henry III., and the Most Illustrious King Edward I., known as vol. iii. of Prynne's Records, (Dedication dated 1668,) was pub. 1670, fol., (Index to ditto, 1775, fol., pp. xviii.;) with the title-page and an address to the reader in Latin, 1672, fol.; and another Latin title-page, as vol. iii of Spelman's Concilia Decreta, etc., in 1688, fol. Of vols. i. and ii., part of vol. iii., and the unfinished vol. iv., (infra,) many copies were destroyed in the great fire of 1666; and it is supposed that not more than twenty-five sets of vols. i., ii., and iii. are in existence. The Merly copy (vols. i., ii., and iii.) was bought by Dr. Dibdin, (who was authorized to give 200 guineas,) for £152 5*s.*, for Sir M. M. Sykes. Another set, (vols. i., ii., and iii.,) sold by Sotheby & Wilkinson in 1856, was knocked down at £199 11*s.* Of the set in the Stowe Library, sold in 1849, vols. i., ii., and iii. produced £140, and vol. iv., (more properly called vol. i.,) supposed to be unique, was purchased for the Society of Lincoln's Inn for £335. This vol. iv.—doubtless the Introduction promised by Prynne in his Epistle to the Reader prefixed to vol. ii.—is unfinished, has no title-page, and was never published. It is called Book the First, and ends at page 400, with the words coepiscopi tui et coma. An account of it, and of the other three vols. will be found in the (London) Law Review, Aug. 1849, (Prynne's Records,) 432–441. See, also, Oldys's Brit. Lib., 11–21; Bp. Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib., ed. 1776, 139, (also 65, 97;) Hargrave's Pref. to Hale's Parliaments, 71; Dibdin's Bibliog. Decam., iii, 400; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 1825, 286–289; Bridgman's Leg. Bibl., 273; Clarke's Repertor. Bibliog., 254; Bohn's Lowndes, Pt. vii, (1861,) 1986. Although Prynne comes down no later than the death of Edward I., A.D. 1307, (end of vol. iii., pub. after his death,) had he lived he would have continued his Records (such at least was his intention) to the reign of Elizabeth. The value of Prynne's Records it would be difficult to exaggerate. Bishop Nicolson's unworthy sneer has done less injury to his author than to the commentator. He remarks,

"Most of the copies of these two tomes [vols. i. and ii.] perished in the dreadful fire of London, and no man has hitherto thought it worth his expense and while to give us a new edition from any of the few that escaped. His third has enough (in all conscience) to satisfy any reasonable reader, and supersede his inquiry into the state of the case, in either former or following ages."—Eng. Hist. Lib., 139.

Had the Puritan left an annotation so discreditable to a historian, the bishop would have visited the offence with a rod of iron. Much more to the purpose is the comment of the blunt Norroy-King-of-Arms, William Oldys:

"'Tis certain that neither of the three Volumes have been so sufficiently used by, or even known to succeeding Writers of or upon our English History, as such copious Materials, so carefully collected, do deserve."—Brit. Lib., 20, n.

So much for the value of the Records to the historian. As regards the lawyer, it has been well remarked by a modern authority,

"The indefatigable industry of the author in the investigation of innumerable documents, many of which have since perished, has been found of great use to the practical lawyer, in cases involving questions of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, by the direct references to, and numerous transcripts of, original records which the work contains."—Lon. Law Review, Aug. 1849, 434.

We are not at all sure that it would not be worth Mr. H. G. Bohn's "expense and while to give us a new edition" (Bp. Nicolson, ut supra) of the Records, including the unfinished vol. (iv.) in the Library of Lincoln's Inn, with a copious Index Nominum et Rerum to the whole. It is a matter of congratulation that at the present moment (1860) Sir John Romilly, Master of the Rolls, is doing so much, through the instrumentality of his corps of scribes, to render accessible the long-buried annals of British, Saxon, and Norman antiquity: see GREEN, MRS. MARY ANN EVERETT; LEMON, ROBERT; PETRIE, HENRY; PINKERTON, JOHN, after No. 23. 50. Aurum Reginæ, 1668, 4to. Refers to the revenues of the Queen-Consorts of England. 51. Brief Animadversions on, Amendments of, and additional Explanatory Records to, the fourth part of the Institvtes of the Lawes of England, concerning the Iurisdiction of Covrts, compiled by Sir Edw. Coke, Knt., wherein the Misquotations, Mistakes of Records, are rectified, many Omissions supplied, especially such as relate to the Members of the High Courts of Parliament, with 10 Alphabetical Tables thereto, &c., 1669, fol.

"His [Coke's] great age when he came to lick these papers over for the press would not admit of nicety and exactness; and he died before they were published. In Will. Prynne's Animadversions upon them, a great many misquotations of records, &c. are noted, and the learned author is more severely reflected on than he ought to have been for a posthumous work, wherein we know not what injustice might be done him by the publishers of his Orphan-Labours."—Bishop Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib., ed. 1776, 161.

See, also, (respecting Coke,) ibid., 153, 156, 161, 163, 187, 192; Marvin's Leg. Bibl., 204–212, and authorities there cited; COKE, SIR EDWARD, p. 402, supra.

What the bishop says above is well said; and it may appropriately introduce a few lines handed us by a black-letter student, (a judge in one of the courts of the United States,) expressive of his own opinion of the merits and demerits of the legal and historical publications of this laborious compiler:

"The profoundness of his learning, and the accuracy of his report of the materials which he has brought to light, and the consummate ability with which he discusses the interesting and important subjects of his numerous works, have given an undeserved reputation to his intellectual productions. He was a mere controversialist, and, as a controversialist, uncandid and uncharitable. His judgment bore no proportion to his intelligence. While we borrow from the rich stores which his industry and zeal have accumulated, we cannot follow him as a guide. Accurately as he reports his materials, his use of them is injudicious and unfair. Hargrave's elaborate preface to Sir Matthew Hale's Jurisdiction of the House of Lords seems to have been written with a view to prevent the legal profession from overrating the value of Prynne's writings. If this was Hargrave's purpose, he has prosecuted it successfully."

Clarendon tells us that Prynne was "not unlearned in the profession of the law as far as learning is acquired by the mere reading of books." (Hist. of the Rebellion, book iii., ed. 1839, i. 324.) See, also, LILBURNE, JOHN, p. 1100, (Clarendon Papers.) Of his political and religious sentiments, and his manner of exhibiting them, we cannot expect to find the Lord Chancellor an admirer. It is worthy of note, however, that Prynne's most valuable publication, the Records, (No. 49, supra,) "received its original conception, augmentation, and production" from his lordship's "unexpected voluntary motion and subsequent encouragements." See Prynne's Dedication of vol. ii. to Edward, Earl of Clarendon.

Sir Symonds D'Ewes evidently had a great respect for the reformer at the time he was brought under the saws and harrows of the Philistines on account of his Histrio-Mastix, ("He was a most learned, religious gentleman,") and risked his own safety by visiting him in prison. (See D'Ewes's Journal, May 8, 1634.)

A greater than Clarendon or D'Ewes, or any other friend or enemy of the "voluminous Prynne," wittily, if not very charitably, characterizes the latter as

"a late hot querist for tythes, whom ye may know, by his wits lying ever beside him in the margin, to be ever beside his wits in the text. A fierce reformer once; now rankled with a contrary heat."—Milton's Considerations touching the Likeliest Means to Remove Hirelings out of the Church, 1659.

But the immortal Bard of Paradise was also a violent polemic, and his dicta are not to be accepted as infallible. For other notices of Prynne, of whom this sketch will be found one of the fullest of modern accounts, see Clarendon's Rebellion, book iii.; Rushworth's Collec.; Biog. Brit., Supp.; Genl. Psalmanazar, George, 1679?–1763, was the assumed name of a literary impostor, supposed to have been born in the south of France, who at the age of sixteen, when in Germany, conceived an idea, successfully carried out, of passing himself off for a native of the island of Formosa. After many adventures in many characters, he was brought to London by the Rev. Wm. Innes, chaplain to the Scotch regiment of Sluys, was patronized by Bishop Compton, and translated the Church Catechism into his invented Formosan language, and also pub. (in 1704) his fictitious Description of Formosa; studied, under the auspices of the bishop, at Oxford, and subsequently led for several years an idle and extravagant life in London; became penitent and studious when about thirty-two years of age, and for the rest of his life—about half a century—was noted for that exemplary piety which elicited the respect and enthusiastic admiration of Dr. Johnson. 1. Historical and Geographical Description of Formosa, &c., Lon., 1704, 8vo; 2d ed., with a Vindication, 1705, 8vo. In French, Amst., 1705, 8vo. This fictitious narration, written by Psalmanazar in Latin, and trans. for him into English as it went through the press, was partially compiled from the genuine account of Candidius, (see Churchill's Voyages, i. 503, 1704,) and Dr. Varenius's Latin Descriptio Régni Japoniæ et Siam, &c., Amst., 1649, 24mo; Camb., 1673, 8vo.

"Psalmanazar exceeded in powers of description any of the great impostors of learning. His island of Formosa was an illusion eminently bold, and maintained with as much felicity as erudition; and vast must have been that erudition which could, on scientific principles, form a language and its grammar."—Disraeli's Curiosities of Lit.

He also wrote a vol. of Essays on several Scriptural Subjects, and a version of the Psalms; pub. anonymously an Essay on Miracles, by a Layman, (an ed., 1793, 8vo,) which was highly commended; completed Palmer's History of Printing, (see PALMER, SAMUEL;) contributed to the Ancient Universal History the histories of the Jews, Gauls, and Spaniards, and Xenophon's Retreat, (see BOWER, ARCHIBALD, p. 227, supra;) and aided the booksellers in various undertakings, by which employment he gained a comfortable support. "Among Johnson's associates at this time may be mentioned . . . the penitent impostor, George Psalmanazar, who, after poring all day, in a humble lodging, on the folios of Jewish rabbis and Christian fathers, indulged himself at night with literary and theological conversation at an ale-house in the city."—Lord Macaulay: Samuel Johnson, in Encyc. Brit., 8th ed., xii., 1856.

"Johnson.—'I never sought much after anybody; . . . but I sought after George Psalmanazar the most. I used to go and sit with him at an ale-house in the city.' 'I should as soon think of contradicting a bishop.' "—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

"I have heard Johnson frequently say that George Psalmanazar's piety, penitence, and virtue exceeded almost what we read as wonderful in the lives of the saints. . . . His pious and patient endurance of a tedious illness, ending in an exemplary death, confirmed the strong impression his merit had made upon the mind of Dr. Johnson."—Mrs. Piozzi.

Pughe, William Owen, 1759–1835, a native of Merionethshire, has been already noticed under the name which he bore for the greater part of his life: see Owen, William; Jones, Owen; English Cyc., art. on Welsh Language, (by T. Watts,) and same work, Biog., iv. 1007. Of Owen's Welsh and English Dictionary a new (the best) ed. was issued at Denbigh in 1832, 2 vols. r. 8vo. Of the Myvyrian Archaiology of Wales, ed. by Owen Jones, Edward Williams, and William Owen, 2 vols. were pub. in 1801, and the third and last in 1807. Owen edited Y Greal, a Welsh magazine, and appears to have edited three vols. (the first in 1796, the last in 1818) of the Cambrian Register. He also pub. in 1819 a trans. of Paradise Lost ('Coll Gwnfa) into Welsh, and rendered Bishop Heber's Palestine and many of Mrs. Hemans's poems into the same language. His son, Aneurin Owen, 1792–1851, edited the Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales, pub. in 1841, fol.; also in 1841, 2 vols. r. 8vo.

Pugin, Augustus, d. in London, 1832, a native of France, but a resident of England from an early age, gained great consideration as an architectural draughtsman. He was for many years an assistant of Mr. Joseph Nash, (see p. 1402, supra,) and was subsequently employed by Mr. Ackerman, for whom he drew the architectural views in the Microcosm of London, Lon., 1808–11, 3 vols. 4to, and in other works. It is hardly necessary to add that the works of Mr. Pugin are invaluable to the antiquary as well as to the artist and architect.

Pugin, Augustus Northmore Welby, 1811–1852, son of the preceding, and Professor of Ecclesiastical Antiquities at St. Marie's College, Oscott, whilst yet a youth of fourteen to sixteen years of age attracted attention by his architectural scenery designed and painted for Her Majesty's Theatre and Covent Garden, (in which he assisted the Grieves,) and by his designs for furniture, plate, &c., (for Morel and Seddon, Rundall and Bridge, and others.) About 1834 he joined the Roman Catholic Church, and henceforth distinguished himself for his hearty zeal in the advocacy of her doctrines and the adornment of her holy places. About a year before his death, his mind gave way under the constant pressure to which it had long been subjected by excessive action, and the discipline of a lunatic-asylum added another to the many sad lessons which seem to be the soonest forgotten by those to whom they should prove of the most profit. To the great joy of his friends, he was restored to reason, and on Saturday, the 11th of September, 1852, he was carried to his "loved abode at Ramsgate;" but on the following Tuesday he was seized with a fit, and died on the same night. A biographical notice of Mr. Pugin, by his friend, Mr. Talbot Bury, was published in The Builder, (see Sept. or Oct. 1852,) and another sketch of the deceased will be found in the Gentleman's Magazine, Nov. 1852, 534–538; see, also, March, 1853, 281, (sale of his Collection and Library;) Illus. Lon. News, Oct. 2, 1854. He was thrice married, and his widow enjoys a pension of £100 per annum from the Civil List. We have already noticed the assistance rendered by Mr. Pugin in the preparation of works published by his father, (see PUGIN, AUGUSTUS, Nos. 4, 6, and 10;) his own publications were the following: 1. Designs for Gothic Furniture, XVth Century, Lon., 1836, r. 4to. 2. Designs for Iron and Brass Work, XVth and XVIth Centuries, 1836, 4to. 3. Designs for Gold and Silver Ornaments, XVth and XVIth Centuries, 1836, 4to. 4. Details of Ancient Timber Houses, XVth and XVIth Centuries, 1836, 4to. 5. Contrasts; or, A Parallel between the Noble Edifices of the XIVth and XVth Centuries and Similar Buildings of the Present Day, showing the Decay of Taste, accompanied by Appropriate Text, 1836, 4to; 2d ed., improved, 1841, 4to. This work, in which "the wretched state of architecture at the present day" is assailed in no gentle terms, offended many by telling (it has been remarked) "the bluntest and most disagreeable truths in the bluntest possible manner;" but its strictures are now regarded in a more favourable light. See Blackw. Mag., Dec. 1855: Modern Light Literature,—Art. 6. The True Principles of Pointed or Christian Architecture, 1841, 4to, (reviewed in Archæologist, Oct. 1841, 49–68;) 2d ed., 1853, 4to; in French, by T. H. King, Brussels, 1850, 4to. See No. 7. 7. An Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture in England, 1843, 4to; 2d ed., 1853, 4to. Originally pub., with illustrations from his works, in Dublin Review, 1841–42. Supplementary to No. 6. 8. The Present State of Ecclesiastical Architecture in England, with Thirty-Six Illustrations: reprinted from the Dublin Review, Nos. 20 and 23, 1843, 8vo. 9. Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornament and Costume, 1844, r. 4to; 2d ed., revised and enlarged by Rev. Bernard Smith, of Oscott College, 1846, r. 4to, £7 7s.; 1868, 4to, £6 6s. This splendid work, which should accompany No. 10, is illustrated by 70 plates printed in gold and colours by the new litho-chromolithographic process, and about 50 wood-cuts in the letter-press. In the 2d ed. Mr. Smith gives us extracts from the works of Durandus, Georgius, Bona, Catalini, Gerbert, Martene, Molanus, Thiers, Mabillon, Ducange, &c. 10. Designs for Floriated Ornament, 1849, r. 4to. See No. 9. 11. History of the Restored Church of St. Mary Wymeswold, 1850, 4to. 12. Treatise on Chancel Screens and Rood Lofts, 1851, 4to, also l. p. In addition to these professional works,—which justly place Mr. Pugin in the first rank of his profession,—he pub. a number of religious tracts, of which we notice: 13. An Address to the Inhabitants of Ramsgate, 1850. 14. An Earnest Appeal for the Revival of the Ancient Plain Song, 1850. 15. The Present State of Public Worship among the Roman Catholics, 1850. A list of the churches, chapels, convents, school-houses, &c. erected under the directions of Mr. Pugin will be found in Mr. Talbot Bury's biographical sketch above noticed. Mr. Myers built for him no less than thirty-six churches; and, indeed, for many years before his death Pugin would allow no other builder to be employed in carrying out his designs. He furnished many designs for monuments and Gothic metal-work, (in the manufacture of which he was associated commercially with Messrs. Hardman of Birmingham,) and practised landscape-painting with great success. At Ramsgate this zealous and conscientious religionist (ever active in deeds of mercy to the living and the dead) erected a church, (St. Augustine's,) schools, &c., entirely at his own expense; and his body fitly rests in a vault of the sacred edifice which in life he loved so well. In his rare intervals of leisure he sought recreation on the bosom of the great deep, and was wont to say that "there is nothing worth living for but Christian architecture and a boat." He accompanied Kossuth in his tour through the United States from November, 1851, to June, 1852. He has since with his wife resided in London, and supports himself by his pen. Taylor, Lon., 1849; The War in Hungary, trans. by J. E. Taylor, 1849, with Introductory Remarks; The Village Notary, trans. from the Hungarian of Baron Eötvös by Otto Wenckstern, 1850, 3 vols. p. 8vo, (see Edin. Rev., April 1850, 497–503, by Mr. Donne;) prefixed an Historical Introduction to Memoirs of a Hungarian Lady, (see Pulszky, Theresa, infra;) pub. in 1854 The Tricolour on the Atlas, or Algeria and the French Conquest, partly trans. from the German of Dr. M. Wagner, cr. 8vo, N. York, 1855, 12mo, (see Lon. Athen., 1854, 1325;) contributed papers to the Indigenous Races of the Earth, 1857, (see Nott, Josiah, M.D., No. 3, supra,) and articles on politics, archæology, &c. to Hungarian and English periodicals, and is joint author, in conjunction with Madame Pulszky, of the following works: 3. Tales and Traditions of Hungary, 1851, 3 vols. p. 8vo, (N. York, 1852, 12mo;) vols. ii. and iii. were also pub. separately, under the title of The Jacobins in Hungary, 1851. These vols. are occupied by a history of the conspiracy of Martinovics.

"This book is the production of two very different minds,—a circumstance which enhances its charm to the reader, but aggravates difficulty to a reviewer. Theresa Pulszky, imaginative, quick of discernment, pictorial, affectionate, plays the treble part of the duet; her husband, a deep-searching, wide-ranging, calm-judging, clear, generous intellect, fills up the harmony of the bass."—Prof. Francis W. Newman.

Pulszky, Madame Theresa, b. 1815, at Vienna, married in 1845 to the preceding; in addition to her share in the authorship of the two works just noticed, (Nos. 3 and 4, supra,) has pub.: 1. Memoirs of a Hungarian Lady; with an Historical Introduction by Francis Pulszky, Lon., 1850, 2 vols. p. 8vo; Phila., 1850, 12mo; 2d ed., Lon., 1855, 2 vols. cr. 8vo.

"It cannot fail to excite an interest in readers of all classes. . . . We have to thank M. Pulszky for a brief and very able summary of the history of Hungary from the days of Arpad to the reign of Ferdinand the First and the reform movement of 1847."—Mr. Donne: *Edin. "The memoirs, indeed, contain sketches of social life which are worthy of a place by the side of Madame de Staël de Launay and Madame Campan. But they are also rich in political and topographical information of the first character."—Mr. Blackett, M.P.: Lon. Globe.

Pulte, Joseph Hippolyt, M.D., b. Oct. 6, 1811, at Meschede, Westphalia, educated at the gymnasia of Brilon and Soest and at the University of Marburg, came to the United States in 1834, and for six years practised medicine at Allentown, Penna. Having become a convert to Homœopathy, he aided in the establishment of a Homœopathic College at Allentown. Since 1840 he has resided chiefly at Cincinnati, Ohio; in 1852 was elected to the chair of Clinical Medicine at the Western Homœopathic College at Cleveland, and also filled the chair of Obstetrics for the two years following. He has been a contributor to the Allentown Correspondenz-Blatt, 1835-36, to the Amer. Mag. of Homœop. and Hydrop., and to the Quart. Homœop. Mag.; co-editor of Amer. Mag. of Homœop. and Hydrop., 1852–54, and of Quar. Homœop. Mag., 1854; editor of Teste's Diseases of Children, trans. by Emma H. Cote, 2d ed., Cin., 1857, 12mo; and has pub. the following works: 1. Pulteney, Richard, M.D., 1730–1801, a native of Loughborough, Leicestershire, was for some time a surgeon and apothecary at Leicester, afterwards officiated as travelling physician to his relative the Earl of Bath, and subsequently practised, distinguished both as a physician and botanist, at Blandford, Dorsetshire, until his death. 1. Mag., 71; Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 588, 590.

Pulteney, William, Earl of Bath, 1682–1764, educated at Christ Church, Oxford, became M.P. for Hedon, Yorkshire, 1705, and soon rose to distinction as a Whig and as a personal friend of Walpole; from 1725 to 1742 was one of the most bitter of Walpole's opponents, and acted as chief assistant to Bolingbroke in the Craftsman, (see p. 215, supra;) in 1731 fought a duel with Lord Hervey, (see p. 835,) in which both received trifling wounds; "shrunk into insignificance and an earldom" (Lord Chesterfield) in 1742; was prime minister for two days in February, 1746, and thenceforth took but little part in public affairs. 1. He also wrote some poetical pieces, Epistles, &c., for a list of which see Park's Walpole's R. and N. Authors, iv. 277–278.

"Speaker Onslow describes him as 'having the most popular parts for public speaking of any man he ever knew,' (Coxe's Life of Walpole, Append., v. 3;) and there could not be a better witness. His style was correct and classical beyond that of all other men; and his unpremeditated compositions were as correct and elegant as his most prepared. The same high authority has recorded of his spirit and his fire, when upon popular topics, that it was the spirit and the fire by which the orators of the ancient commonwealths governed the people."—Lord Brougham: ubi supra, 154.

"While Sir Robert Walpole was prime minister, a question arose one day in the House between him and Pulteney, Earl of Bath. It related to a passage in Horace, on which they wagered a guinea. The bet was won by Pulteney; and the identical guinea may still be seen in the British Museum, with the following note in the winner's own hand: 'This guinea I desire may be kept as an heirloom. It was won of Sir Robert Walpole, in the House of Commons, he asserting the verse in Horace to be "Nulli pallescere culpæ," whereas I laid the wager of a guinea that it was "Nulla pallescere culpa." He sent for the book, and, being convinced that he had lost, gave me this guinea. I told him I could take the money without a blush on my side, but believed it was the only money he ever gave in the House where the giver and receiver ought not to blush. This guinea, I hope, will prove to my posterity the use of knowing Latin, and encourage them in their learning.'"

Purcell, Henry, 1658–1695, the greatest of English musicians, a native of Westminster, received his musical education under Captain Cook, Master of the Chapel Children, and profited to some extent by the instructions of Dr. John Blow; in 1676 succeeded Dr. Christopher Gibbons as Organist of Westminster Abbey; and in 1682 became one of the Organists of the Royal Chapel. His numerous anthems for cathedrals (commenced in his boyhood) gave him great celebrity; but it is asserted that "the greatness of his genius is most conspicuous in his compositions for the chamber and the stage." Notices of Purcell and his many compositions will be found in Burney's Hist. of Music; Burney's Life of Purcell in Rees's Cyc.; Hawkins's Hist. of Music; Seward's Biographiana; English Cyc., Biog., iv. 1857, 1015–1017. See, also, T. Moore's Memoirs, &c., ii. 158, 159, 179; iv. 148. His anthems have appeared in various collections, and nearly all of them were recently pub. together in one complete work. The early publications of Purcell's music are: 1. Twelve Sonatas for Two Violins and a Bass for the Organ and Harpsichord, 1683. 2. Dioclesian; an Opera, 1691. 3. A Collection of Ayres composed for the Theatre and on other Occasions by the Late Henry Purcell, 1697. In use until superseded by Handel's concerto and other new compositions. 4. Orpheus Britannicus: a Collection of all the Choicest Songs for One, Two, and Three Voices, with Symphonies, a Thorough-Bass, &c., 1698, fol.; 1702, fol.; 1706–11, 2 vols. in 1, fol. The last is the editio optima. The editio princeps (1698) was pub. by subscription, at 20*s.* per copy. See Blackw. Mag., xlv. 4; Blow, John; Playford, John.

"The unlimited powers of Purcell's genius embraced every species of musical composition known in his time, and with equal felicity. . . . Purcell is as much the pride of an Englishman in music, as Shakspeare in productions for the stage, Milton in Epic Poetry, Locke in Metaphysics, or Sir Isaac Newton in Philosophy and Mathematics."—Dr. Burney: Hist. of Music.

Purchas, Samuel, D.D., 1577–1628, a native of Thaxted, Essex, educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1604 was instituted to the vicarage of Eastwood, Essex, which cure he soon resigned to a brother,—as a preparation of his great work required him to reside in London. He subsequently became Rector of St. Martin's, Ludgate, and chaplain to Archbishop Abbot, and at the time of his death was in expectation of a deanery procured him by Charles I. His latter years were embarrassed, (but it is not true, as asserted, that he died in prison,) partly, it is probable, by the expenses of publishing his Pilgrimes, but certainly by his exertions to provide for his widowed sister, Mrs. Pridmore and her family, and the four orphan children of his brother, Daniel Purchas. His publications are the following: 1. Purchas his Pilgrimage; or, Relations of the World and the Religions observed in all Ages and Places discovered, from the Creation unto this Present. In foure Parts, &c., Lon., fol., 1613; 2d ed., 1614; 3d ed., with Additions, 1617; 4th and best ed., with Additions, and illustrated with maps and three treatises annexed, 1626. This last ed. always accompanies and forms the 5th vol. of No. 2.

"This my first Voyage of Discoverie, besides mine owne pore stocke laide thereon, hath made mee indebted to above twelve hundred Authours, of one or other kinde, in I know not how many hundredths of their Treatises, Epistles, Relations, and Histories, of divers Subjectes and Languages, borrowed by my selfe; besides what (for want of the Authors themselves) I have taken upon trust (f other men's goods in their hands."—Dedication to Archbishop Abbot, 4th ed., 1626.

2. Haklvyts Posthumus, or Pvrchas his Pilgrimes. Contayning a History of the World, in Sea Voyages and Lande Trauells by Englishmen and others, &c. In fower Parts, each containing five Bookes, 1625, 4 vols. fol. The 4th ed. of No. 1, 1626, fol., always accompanies these four vols; and the five are known by booksellers and collectors as Purchas's Pilgrimes, 5 vols. fol., 1625–26. The difference between the Pilgrimage and the Pilgrimes is thus set forth by Purchas himself in the Dedication from which we have just quoted:

"These brethren, ["voluminous twinnes of Pilgrimes," he elsewhere calls them,] holding much resemblance in name, nature, and feature, yet differ in both the object and the subject. This [the Pilgrimage] being mine own in matter, though borrowed, and in form of words and method; whereas my Pilgrimes are the authors themselves, acting their own parts in their own words, only furnished by me with such necessaries as that stage further required, and ordered according to my rules."

The contents of the five vols. are as follows: Vol. i. of the Pilgrimes contains Voyages and Travels of Ancient Kings, Patriarchs, Apostles, and Philosophers; Voyages of Circumnavigation of the Globe; and Voyages along the Coasts of Africa to the East Indies, Japan, China, the Philippine Islands, and the Persian and Arabian Gulfs. Vol. ii. contains Voyages and Relations of Africa, Ethiopia, Palestine, Arabia, Persia, and other parts of Asia. Vol. iii. contains Tartary, China, Russia, North-West America, and the Polar Regions. Vol. iv. contains America and the West Indies. Vol. v., the Pilgrimage, contains a Theological and Geographical History of Asia, Africa, and America. For a more minute account of this great work, consult authorities quoted from and referred to below. The use made in the Pilgrimes of Hakluyt's MS. Collections has been already explained: see HAKLUYT, RICHARD, No. 8. Purchas in his title-page gives this account of his materials:

"Some left written by Mr. Hakluyt at his death. More since added, His also perused and perfected. All examined, abreuiated, Illustrated with Notes, enlarged with Discourses, Adorned with Pictures, and expressed in Mapps."

We are sorry to say that these "Mapps," especially that of Virginia, the Indexes to the volumes, and the original frontispiece to vol. i. of the Pilgrimes, are wanting in many copies. For such barbarous mutilation what language is too severe? Oh, John Bagford, (see p. 98, supra,) James Granger, (p. 718, supra,) and Samuel Pepys, (supra,) what mischief have ye done!

In our article on Hakluyt we also quoted some opinions on and comparisons between the collections of Hakluyt and Purchas; but we can hardly dismiss the subject without a few more citations:

"This worthy divine, who is by some stiled our English-Ptolemy, . . . being desirous to forward his natural geny he had to the collecting and writing of voyages, travels, and pilgrimages, left his cure to his brother," &c.—Wood's Fasti Oxon., Bliss's ed., i. 363.

"He has imitated Hakluyt too much, swelling his work into five volumes in folio: yet the whole collection is very valuable, as having preserved many considerable voyages that might otherwise have perished. But, like Hakluyt, he has thrown in all that came to hand to fill up so many volumes, and is excessive full of his own notions and of mean quibbling and playing upon words: yet, for such as can make choice of the best, the collection is very valuable."—Explan. Cat. of Voy. prefixed to Churchill's Collec., ascribed to John Locke.

We shall have to protest against this verdict, as we did against the same critic's censure of Hakluyt, (p. 755, supra.)

"This work is not only valuable for the various instruction and amusement contained in it, but is also very estimable on a national and, I may add, a religious account."—GRANGER: Biog. Hist. of Eng., 5th ed., 1824, ii. 68.

"This was the book which Purchas informs Charles I. in his Dedication his father read every night with great profit and satisfaction."—Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature.

"We owe to the zeal and vast erudition of this laborious man one of the most celebrated collections of voyages which have ever appeared, valuable alike for the abundance of its materials and its importance in the history of early discoveries, especially those of the English."—Biog. universelle.

"The Pilgrims and Pilgrimage of Purchas exhibit a monument of care, diligence, and research that of its kind can hardly be surpassed."—Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 392.

"The accuracy of this useful compiler has been denied by those who have had better means of knowledge, and probably is inferior to that of Hakluyt; but his labour was far more comprehensive. The Pilgrim was, at all events, a great source of knowledge to the contemporaries of Purchas."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 227.

In Pinkerton's Collection of Voyages and Travels the accuracy of Purchas is impugned. We need not be surprised that the voluminous compilations and theological dissertations of Purchas excited the ridicule of the author of Hudibras:

"Dr. Bulwer's Artificial Changling, Browne's Vulgar Errors Purchas's Pilgrim, and even Pliny's Natural History, are the frequent objects of his satire."—Rev. Dr. T. Nash to Bp. Percy, March 2, 1791: Nichols's Illust. of Lit., viii., 1858, 281.

Of the compilations of Hakluyt and Purchas Dr. Drake remarks,

"These vast and valuable collections are an honour to the reigns of Elizabeth and James, and, notwithstanding the industry and research of the moderns, have not yet been superseded."—Shakspeare and his Times, 1817, i. 477.

3. Purchas his Pilgrim. Microcosmus, or the Historie of Man: a Series of Meditations on Man at all Ages and in all Stations, founded on Psalm xxxix. 5, 1619, 8vo; 1627, 8vo. This is sometimes called Purchas's Funeral Sermon. 4. The King's Tower and Triumphal Arch of London, in a Serm. on 2 Sam. xxii. 51, 1623, 8vo.

The reputation of the learning and labours of this worthy divine was not confined to his own land. An erudite foreigner thus testifies to his merits:

"Samuel Purchas, Anglus, linguarum et Artium divinarum atque humanarum egregie peritus Philosophicus, Historicus, et Theologus maximus, patriæ Ecclesiæ, antistes fidelis, multis egregiis Scriptis, et in primis orientalis, occidentalisque Indiæ vastio Voluminibus patria lingua conscripta celeberrimus."—JOH. BOSSARDI: Bibliotheca.

Purver, Antony, 1702–1777, a native of Uphusborn, Hampshire, was for some time apprentieed to a shoemaker, and whilst tending his sheep commenced studying the Hebrew language, to which he subsequently added the Greek and other tongues. Removing to London, he became a minister of the religious Society of Friends. He taught school in his native town, and afterwards at Frenchay. 1. The Youth's Delight, Lon., 1727. 2. A New and Literal Translation of all the Books of the Old and New Testaments, with Notes Critical and Explanatory, Lon., 1764, 2 vols. fol. Two or three numbers were issued in 1746: see Lon. Gent. Mag. for that year. The work, upon which Purver laboured for thirty years, was finally published at the expense of Dr. Fothergill: see FOTHERGILL, JOHN, M.D., (supra.) Purver revised it for a second edition, but this has never seen the light.

"It is calculated to be of little use. It is often ungrammatical, and as frequently unintelligible. The notes are very similar to the text, and, what is worse, full of pride and ill nature, [especially with reference to Dr. Kennicott.] Notwithstanding these prominent and pervading defects, Purver sometimes gives a better rendering than occurs in our version; and those who are curious in translations of the Bible will not fail to add the Quaker's version to their stock."—*Orme's Bibl. "A crude, incondite, and unshapely pile, without order, symmetry, or taste."—Dr. Geddes.

"The Notes are numerous, pertinent, and limited to the sense of the text. It is highly creditable to a self-educated poor shoemaker."—George Offor.

Pusey, Edward Bouverie, D.D., b. 1800, is the second son of the late Honourable Philip Bouverie, (who assumed the name of Pusey,) younger brother of the first Earl of Radnor, by Lucy, eldest daughter of the fourth Earl of Harborough. He was educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated as a first-rate in classics in 1822; in 1823 was elected a Fellow of Oriel College; in 1826–27 resided for several months in Berlin; occupied with the study of the Hebrew and German languages and theological authors under the guidance of Tholuck, Sack, and other learned divines; and in 1828 succeeded the late Rev. Dr. Nicoll as Canon of Christ Church Cathedral and Regius Professor of Hebrew in the University: he still (1869) holds these important posts, although he was suspended from preaching from 1843 to 1846, in consequence of alleged theological errors in a Sermon on St. Matthew xxvi. 28, entitled The Holy Eucharist a Comfort to the Penitent, 1843, 8vo. For the ten years immediately preceding the delivery of this sermon, Dr. Pusey had given great offence to some, and equal satisfaction to others, by his connection with the Oxford Tracts movement, already referred to in this work: see Croly, Rev. Geo., LL.D., No. 5; Goode, Wm., Nos. 4, 5, and 6; Keble, John; MacIlvaine, Charles Petit, D.D., LL.D., No. 2; Newman, John Henry, D.D.; Palmer, William, No. 8; Perceval, Hon. and Rev. A. P., No. 7; Powell, Baden, No. 9, and other names. This learned divine has given to the world the following publications: 1. An Historical Inquiry into the Probable Causes of the Rationalist Character lately predominant in the Theology of Germany, 1828, 8vo. Part 2, Containing an Explanation of the Views misconceived by Mr. Rose, 1830, 8vo. Commended in Farrar's Crit. Hist. of Free Thought, 1863, Preface, and Note 21 at end. Newman, D.D., in Explanation chiefly in Regard to the Reverential Love due to the Ever-blessed Theotokos, and the Doctrine of her "Immaculate Conception," with an Analysis of Cardinal de Turrecramatus's Work on the "Immaculate Conception," 1869, 8vo. Dr. Pusey revised from a former Translation the Confessions of St. Augustine, 1840, 8vo, (Lib. of the Fathers, i.;) edited The Spiritual Combat, and The Path of Paradise, by L. Scupoli, 2d ed., 1848, 5th ed., 1858, 18mo; edited the Meditations and Prayers of St. Anselm, 1856, fp. 8vo; is one of the authors of the Plain Sermons by Contributors to the Tracts for the Times, [Pusey, Keble, Newman, and Williams,] 1840–48, 10 vols. 8vo, and of the Lenten Sermons preached in the Church of Mary the Virgin, Oxford, 1857, 8vo, and in Great St. Mary's, Cambridge, 1864, p. 8vo, and was one of the translators and editors of Bibliotheca Patrum Ecclesiæ Catholica qui ante Orientis et Occidentis Schisma floruerunt, 1838–52, 36 vols. 8vo, (£21 19*s*.) See, also, URI, JOHN, No. 4. To the authorities already referred to relating to Dr. Pusey and the theological school with which his name has long been connected, we may add: Puseyism, or The New Apostolica, by a Layman, 1839, in Nos.; Peep into No. 90, by Charlotte Elizabeth, 1841, 12mo; Corresp. between Bishop Doane and Dr. Boardman on the Oxford Divinity, 1841, 12mo; Exclusive Claims of the Puseyite Episcopalians Indefensible, by John Brown, D.D., 1842, 12mo; Puseyism not a Popish Bane, but a Catholic Antidote, 1842, 3vo, Geneva and Oxford, 3d ed., 1843, 12mo, and Puseyism Examined, 1843, 12mo, both by J. H. M. D'Aubigné, D.D.; New Spirit of the Age, by R. H. Horne and others, 1844, (see p. 888, supra;) The Anglican Church in the 19th Century, from the German of F. Uhden, 1844, 8vo; Dr. Pusey's Serm. on the Power of the Keys, &c.; a Dream, 1846, 8vo; John Foster's Life and Corresp., 1846, vol. ii.; Puseyism, its Causes and Cure, by John Warren, 12mo; From Oxford to Rome, 1847, 12mo, and, by the same, Rest in the Church, 1848, 12mo; Puseyism Unmasked, or The Jesuit Abroad, by Anti-Vatican, 1850, 12mo; Pen-Pictures of Popular English Preachers, 1852; Preaching, Prosing, Puseyism, &c., by Feltham Burchley, 1858, p. 8vo; The Gathering Tempest: Puseyism and the Confessional Doomed, 1858, 8vo; Poynder's Lit. Extracts, 2d Ser., 392; Uhden's Anglican Church of the 19th Cent.; Historical Notes on the Tractarian Movement, by F. Oakeley, 1864, p. 8vo, (see Dubl. Rev., Aug. 1863;) Dict. univ. des Contemporains, 1858; Blackw. Mag., xxxiv. 682, 694, l. 164; Chris. Exam., xi. 309, (by J. Dowling.) xxxv. 116; N. York Rev., v. 136, vi. 198; ROWAN, ARTHUR BLENNERHASSETT, No. 2; URI, JOHN, No. 4; WEAVER, ROBERT, No. 6; WILSON, DANIEL, D.D., No. 11. As we have already intimated, (see NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY, D.D., p. 1413, supra,) we have here no speculations of our own to offer upon the merits or demerits of the theological and ecclesiastical doctrines zealously supported and vigorously combated in the various authorities to which we have, with conscientious impartiality, directed the attention of the reader in the preceding pages. Whatever difference of opinion, however, may be entertained respecting the dogmas held or supposed to be held by this eminent divine, there is but one testimony respecting his profound learning, untiring zeal, and exemplary piety. And it is but justice to add that he has repeatedly and earnestly protested against the use of his name as the distinguishing badge of a party,—professing himself to be nothing more than a follower of the Fathers of the ancient Catholic Church of the English branch, of which he considers himself a consistent disciple.

Pusey, Philip, 1799–1855, brother of the preceding, succeeded to the Pusey estates in Berkshire, 1828; was M.P. for Chippenham, 1830, for Cashel, 1831, and for Berkshire from Dec. 1834 to 1852; married Lady Emily Frances Theresa Herbert, second daughter of Henry George, 2d Earl of Carnarvon, 1822; President of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, 1854, and for several years editor of, and one of the chief contributors to, the Journal of that Society. To his pen in the Agricultural Journal, and to his example on his lands, English farming is greatly indebted for the rapid advances it has made in the last quarter of a century. Putnam, George, D.D., a Unitarian minister, b. at Sterling, Worcester co., Mass., graduated at Harvard College, 1826, was ordained at Roxbury, Mass., July 7, 1830, and has been stationed there until the present date, (1860.) Since 1853 he has been a member of the Board of President and Fellows of Harvard College, and from July, 1849, to July, 1856, was editorially connected with the Christian Examiner. He has pub. a number of separate Sermons, Orations, &c., and articles in periodicals.

Putnam, George Palmer, b. Feb. 7, 1814, at Brunswick, Maine, long and favourably known as a compiler of several good books and the publisher and distributor of many more, is descended (as are all the Putnams in the United States) from John Putnam, who emigrated from Buckinghamshire, England, to Salem, Mass., in 1640. He is the great-nephew of General Israel Putnam, and the grandson of General Joseph Palmer, who was a member of the Boston Revolutionary "tea-party," a volunteer at Lexington and Bunker Hill, and a friend of Washington. After some years' experience as a bookseller in the city of New York, Mr. Putnam established a branch of the firm of Wiley & Putnam, in the same business, in London, where he resided from 1836 to 1847, an able and zealous representative of American literary interests. Since the last-named date he has been engaged as a publisher and bookseller in New York. Between the ages of 15 and 18 he compiled the first volume in the following list, and at the age of 20 edited The Bookseller's Advertiser, a monthly periodical, (the first of the kind,) of which 12 Nos. were pub.

in 1834. This journal was succeeded by Duyckinck's Literary World, 1847–53, and by other literary periodicals noticed on a preceding page: see NORTON, CHARLES B. Mr. Putnam's own publications are the following: 1. Chronology; or, An Introduction and Index to Universal History, Biography, and Useful Knowledge, N. York, 1833, 12mo, pp. 432. Anon. 1000 copies sold. See No. 6. 2. The Tourist in Europe: a Concise Guide, &c., with Memoranda of a Tour in 1836, 12mo, 1838. 1000 copies sold. 3. American Book Circular, with Notes and Statistics, N. York and Lon., 1843. 4. American Facts: Notes and Statistics relative to the Government, Resources, Engagements, Manufactures, Commerce, Religion, Education, Literature, Fine Arts, Manners, and Customs of the United States of America, with Portraits and a Map, Lon. and N. York, 1845, 8vo, pp. 292. 1500 copies sold.

Also favourably noticed by Eclec. Rev., Lon. Lit. Gaz., Illum. Mag., Atlas, M. Chron., (all pub. in London,) Brighton Guardian, Edin. Scotsman, and many other journals; less graciously treated by Lon. Athen. and Lon. Spectator. See, also, N. York Eclec. Mag., v. 410; Lon. Bookseller, June 24, 1858, 243. It is not to be doubted that the circulation of this volume did much to increase respect for the United States in Europe. 5. A Pocket Memorandum-Book in France, Italy, and Germany in 1847, N. York, 1848, 16mo. Privately printed. John Allan, in 1864, 2421, with new title and 145 plates, $82.50. 6. The World's Progress: a Dictionary of Dates; with Tabular Views of General History, and a Historical Chart, edited by G. P. Putnam, 1850, 12mo, pp. 716; 1851, 12mo. Supplement to close of 1851, 12mo, 1852. New eds., 1854, 12mo; 1861, 12mo and 8vo; 1863, 12mo and 8vo, (Supp. sep.;) 12th 1000, to Aug. 1867, 1867, r. 12mo. Founded on No. 1. In the preface Mr. Putnam informs us that he has largely profited by the excellent Dictionary of Dates of Haydn (most of the 4th ed. of which will be found in the World's Progress) and the Oxford Chronological Tables of D. A. Talboys. See VINCENT, BENJAMIN, No. 2. The World's Progress, which is the first vol. of the series entitled the Home Cyclopædia, (infra,) is highly commended by the N. York Quar. Rev., &c. Among the many valuable publications issued by Mr. Putnam may be noticed: The Popular Library, 24 vols. 12mo; Home Cyclopædia, 1850–53, 5 vols. 12mo; Putnam's Monthly Magazine of American Literature, Science, and Art, 1853–56, 6 vols. 8vo; Putnam's Magazine, Jan. 1868 et seq.

Between 1848 and 1868 he published more than 300 volumes of original American literature, including new works by Irving, Fenimore Cooper, Bryant, Hawthorne, Lowell, Bayard Taylor, Dr. Hawks, Kennedy, Judge Hall, Capt. Wilkes, Prof. B. Silliman, (Sen. and Jr.,) Downing, Tuckerman, Moses Stuart, C. S. Stewart, Asa Gray, Miss Sedgwick, Miss Cooper, Mrs. Kirkland, Miss Warner, Mrs. Gilman.

The services of this gentleman to the interests of sound literature have already been noticed by us in our life of Washington Irving, (pp. 937, 943, supra ;) and the more valuable testimony of Mr. Irving himself to the enterprise, integrity, and courtesy of his friend and publisher has since the lamented decease of the former been given to the world. See Life of W. Irving, Index; Atlantic Mon., Nov. 1860. We need hardly remark that we cordially concur in the observation of an American literary journal of high character, that "the letter of Mr. Irving to Mr. Putnam recently published is a document of which the latter gentleman's posterity will have reason to be proud."

Putnam, Mrs. Mary Lowell, a sister of James Russell Lowell, and already referred to on a preceding page, (see PEABODY, MISS ELIZABETH PALMER,) has attained great distinction as the mistress of many languages and as a contributor to the North American Review and the Christian Examiner. To her also we are indebted for the first translation from the Swedish into the English (Mary Howitt's version is from the German) of Frederika Bremer's novel of The Neighbours. She has published anonymously: 1. Records of an Obscure Man, Bost., 1861, 16mo. See N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1862, 283. 2. Tragedy of Errors, 1862, 16mo. See N. Amer. Rev., April, 1862, 565. 3. Pye, Henry James, LL.D., M.P., 1745–1813, a native of London, educated at Magdalene College, Oxford, was a descendant of one of the most ancient families in England, and was the lineal representative of John Hampden by the female line. He was chosen M.P. for Berkshire in 1784, succeeded Warton as Poet-Laureate in 1790, and was appointed a police magistrate of London in 1792. His principal publications are the following: 1. Elegies, 1763, 4to. 2. Six Olympic Odes of Pindar, being those omitted by Mr. West; trans. into English Verse, with Notes, 1775, 12mo. This is a valuable supplement to Gilbert West's Pindar, 1749, 4to, &c. 3. The Art of War; a Poem, trans. from the French of the K. of Prussia, 1778. 4. Poems on Various Subjects, 1787, 2 vols. 8vo. See No. 13. Among other good pieces in this collection is a translation into English of the Song of Harmodius and Aristogiton. 5. A Translation of the Poetics of Aristotle, first pub. in an 8vo vol., and then, corrected, prefixed to his Commentary on that work, 1788, 4to; better ed., 1792, 4to.

Mathias gives us his opinion of Leonora and the translations in English in a note:

"A sort of Blue-Beard story for the nursery. I am ashamed to think that the publick curiosity (I will not say taste) should have been occupied with such diablerie Tudesque."—(1796.)

Mr. Charles Lukens, of Philadelphia, who has long been employed on an English version of Leonora and a collection of translations, would hardly endorse this verdict. We expect much from Mr. Lukens's patient labours. See Amer. Pub. Circ., June 15, 1863, 168, April 15, 1865, 305, and Oct. 1, 1866, 242, 270.

Mr. Lukens's volume is thus announced, (in press, Phila., Oct. 1866, imp. 4to:) The Ballad of Lenore, by Gottfried August Bürger: a Variorum Monograph, containing the Original German, in both Latin and Gothic Type; a Literal English Prose Translation according to the Teutonic Idiom; One Russian and Thirty English Metrical Versions, including two—one characteristic, the other experimental—by the Editor; all displayed in contrast, stanza by stanza, on the same page; each Rendition being thus a Running Commentary on any or all of the Others; with a Sketch of the Author, an Account of the Sources of the Poem, and an Analysis.

It will be remembered that Southey succeeded to the laurel after it had been declined by Sir Walter Scott and by him pressed on his brother poet.

"We must admit that, as a poet, his Muse's chief attributes are Mediocrity and Morality. . . . An industrious student, a well-informed, cultivated, graceful writer; but a poet he assuredly was not. Weighed in the balance of contemporaneous criticism, he was found wanting; and Time has sanctioned the severe decree."—AUSTIN AND RALPH: ut sup., 333, 345.

Pye, John, an eminent landscape-engraver, b. at Birmingham, 1782, was one of the founders, and has always been one of the most useful members, of The Artists' Fund, of which a detailed account will be found in his Patronage of British Art: an Historical Sketch, Lon., 1845, 8vo. Mr. Pye has also pub. several pamphlets on the inferior position (recently improved) of engravers in the Royal Academy, and has within the last few months issued a vigorous protest against sundry alleged abuses, in his Glance at the Rise and Constitution of the Royal Academy of Arts of London, 1859, 8vo. A review of this publication in the London Athenæum (June 18, 1859, 813–14) concludes with a declaration not quite complimentary to those concerned,—viz.:

"We repeat that all that Art has ever done in England has been done, not through, but in spite of, the Royal Academy."

If this be true, or half true, surely it is time that the record be amended. Mr. Pye's vignettes in Peacock's Pocket-Books, and his plates in The Literary Souvenir and The Amulet, were greatly admired.

4. With WILSON, ERASMUS, A Series of [201] Anatomical Plates in Lithography, r. fol.: with References and Physiological Comments, illustrating the Structure of the Different Parts of the Human Body, 1836–42, bd. in 2 vols., £12; col'd, £20; reduced to £8 8*s.*, and £14; now (1860) sold at £5 5*s.* plain, £8 8*s.* col'd. Also separately, in five divisions, viz.: I. Muscles, 51 plates; II. Vessels, 50 plates; III. Nerves, 38 plates; IV. Viscera, 32 plates; V. Bones and Ligaments, 30 plates. Amer. eds., Phila., 1852, 4to, $15, col'd $30; N. York, 1854, 4to, $20, col'd, $40. The value of these Plates can hardly be exaggerated.

Quain, Richard, younger brother of the preceding, was for many years Professor of Anatomy in University College, and on resigning this post to Mr. Ellis (see ELLIS, GEORGE VINER) was made Professor of Clinical Surgery at the University College Hospital, which office he resigned in 1866. In addition to his editorial labours referred to in the preceding article, and the preparation of many treatises pub. in the Transactions of the Medico-Chirurgical Society and in medical periodicals, he has given to the world the two following very valuable works: 1. The Anatomy and Operative Surgery of the Arteries, [of the Human Body,] in [87] Lithographic Drawings the size of, and drawn from, Nature, with Practical Commentaries, 1844–45, in Nos., imp. fol., bd. (17 Parts) in 2 vols. folded, or in 1 vol. unfolded, with an 8vo vol. of letter-press, 1844, £10 12*s.*; col'd, £13 13*s.* Of a new issue of 500 copies, at £6 6*s.* each, announced in 1846, after which the drawings on the stones were destroyed, 460 copies were subscribed for before Dec. 1, 1847.

"Although we have already given a full and elaborate analysis of this incomparable work, (No. 38, April, 1845,) we are induced to notice it once more," &c.—(Forbes's) Brit. and For. Med. Rev., Oct. 1846.

From the notice thus referred to we extract the conclusion:

"In conclusion, it only remains for us to express our anxiety that the facts collected by Prof. Quain should be generally known by the wide circulation of his work. Our conviction is that no one who peruses it will fail to augment greatly his knowledge of the vascular system. To every operative surgeon and every anatomist its possession is essential; and into all public libraries it must command admission as the unquestioned standard authority on the anatomy and operative surgery of the arteries of the human body."—Forbes's Med. Rev., No. 38.

"It is an honour to the age and country."—Med.-Chir. Rev.

"To the practical surgeon such a volume must be indispensable."—Lancet, Dec. 12, 1840.

Quain, Richard, M.D., cousin of the preceding, and a graduate of the London University, was for many years physician at the University College Hospital, and is now one of the physicians to the Consumption Hospital, Brompton. He is known as the inventor of the Stethometer, and as the author of a valuable paper on Fatty Diseases of the Heart, pub. in the Transactions of the Medico-Chirurgical Society.

Quane, William, of the Isle of Man. The Northern Light; or, The Second Dominion, 1833, 12mo. Prophetic of "the golden happy age." May the author prove a true prophet!

Quarles, Francis, 1592–1644, a native of Stewards, near Rumford, Essex, educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and Lincoln's Inn, was cup-bearer to Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia, and subsequently secretary to Archbishop Usher in Ireland. Upon the breaking out of the Rebellion in 1641, he fled to England, where his piece entitled The Royal Convert, and his attachment to Charles I., attracted the wrath of the parliamentary party, who sequestrated his estates and plundered him of his books and (what author will not sympathize with him in this loss?) several MSS. almost ready for the press. The worthy poet and historiographer (he was Chronicler of the City of London) sunk under this blow, took to his bed, and left it only for the church of St. Vedast, London, where he found his last resting-place. He was the author of many books in prose and verse, and the father of eighteen children, of whom one (vide QUARLES, JOHN, infra) rose to some distinction as an author. These—the works only, presuming that the reader will not be curious about the children—we proceed to enumerate: 1. A Feast for Wormes; in a Poem on the History of Jonah, Lon., 1620, '26, 4to; 1633, sm. 8vo; 1662, 12mo. 2. Pentælogia, or the Quintessence of Meditation, 1620, '26, 4to. 3. Hadassa, or the History of Queen Esther, 1621, 4to. 4. Argalus and Parthenia; a Poem, 1621, '28, '29, '31, '47, '56, 4to; 1677, 8vo; 1684, 8vo; 1687, 4to; 1687, 12mo; 1692, 8vo; 1708, 12mo; 1726, et s. a., 4to. See Brydges's Phillips's Theat. Poet. Sion's Sonnets sung by Solomon the King, and periphras'd, 1624, 4to: Halliwell, 1857, £5 12*s.* 6*d.*; 1625, 4to. 7. Sion's Elegies wept by Jeremie the Prophet, 1625, 4to. 8. Divine Poems, containing Jonah, Esther, Job, Samson, Sion's Sonnets, Elegies, Feast for Wormes, 1630, '33, sm. 8vo; 1634, '38, '42, '43, 12mo; 1652, 16mo; 1664, 1669, 12mo; 1674, sm. 8vo; 1680, 1706, '14, '17, 12mo. 9. The Historie of Sampson, 1631, 4to; 1632. 10. Divine Fancies, digested into Epigrammes, Meditations, and Observations, 1632, '33, '36, '38, '41, 4to; 1652, '57, '60, 12mo; 5th ed., 1664; 1671, 12mo; 7th ed., 1675, 12mo; 1679, '87, 12mo. 11. Bennett and W. H. Rogers, Dec. 1860, cr. 4to, 21*s.*, mor. 31*s.* 6*d.*; with the School of the Heart, 1865, fp. 8vo. Emblems, new ed., 1868, cr. 8vo, 4*s.* 6*d.* See No. 12. It has been asserted that this, the best-known work of the author, and the most popular of English books of Emblems, is in part borrowed from the Emblems of Hermannus Hugo, many of which were taken from Andrew Alciati's Emblemata, Paris, 1635, 8vo; but this indebtedness seems to have been reduced to some of the prints and mottoes and a few of the ideas of the earlier poet.

"Milton was forced to wait till the world had done admiring Quarles."—HORACE WALPOLE: Letters, ed. 1861, iii. 99.

"He was a Poet that mix'd Religion and Fancy together; and was very careful in all his Writings not to intrench upon Good Manners, by any Scurrility in his Works; or any way offending against his Duty to God, his Neighbour, and himself."—LANGBAINE: Dramat. Poets, 1691, 410.

"His visible Poetry (I mean his Emblems) is excellent, catching therein the eye and fancy at one draught, so that he hath out-Alciated therein, in some men's judgement. His Verses on Job are done to the life, so that the Reader may see his sores, and through them the anguish of his soul."—Fuller's Worthies, Essex, 334, ed. 1662.

"We find in Quarles original imagery, striking sentiment, fertility of expression, and happy combinations; together with a compression of style that merits the observation of the writers of verse. Gross deficiencies of judgment and the infelicities of his subjects concurred in ruining him."—HEADLEY: Select Beauties, &c., i., lx.

"An author not of such little merit as generally has been supposed. He is often eloquent and often extremely pathetic."—REV. H. J. TODD.

"I think Quarles may be called the first, as Herbert was the second, divine poet of the English nation."—RYLAND.

"The charitable criticism of the present age has done justice to Quarles in contrasting his merits with his acknowledged deformities. That his perfect specimens of the bathos should have been laughed at in the age of Pope is not surprising. . . . He wrote vigorous prose,—witness his Enchiridion."—CAMPBELL: Specimens Brit. Poets.

"His writings are occasionally defaced by vulgarisms and deformed by quaint conceits, but his beauties abundantly atone for his defects; the latter being comparatively few, while his works generally are characterized by great learning, lively fancy, and profound piety."—JAMES MONTGOMERY.

"He is continually quaint, where he meant to be poetical; and turgid, where he intended to be sublime. He either soars into the regions of bombast and extravagance, or sinks down into a state of very prosaical flatness. . . . And yet the poetry of Quarles is not entirely deficient in merit. That, indeed, in a man of his high rank of intellect, would be impossible. . . . As a prose writer, Quarles stands upon much more distinguished ground. He has been excelled by none of his contemporaries in vigour or nervousness of language."—Lon. Retrospec. Review, v., 1822, 181.

"He uses language sometimes as greatly as Shakespeare; and though there is not much straight grain in him, there is plenty of tough, crooked timber. In an age when Herbert is revived, Quarles surely ought not to be forgotten."—H. D. THOREAU: Letters, 1865, 12mo.

Quarles, John, 1624–1665, son of the preceding, a native of Essex, admitted into Exeter College, Oxford, in 1642, was a captain in the Royal Army and served against the Parliamentarians, and, after the ruin of the royal cause, wrote poetry for a living in London, until carried away by the plague. 1. Quillinan, Edward, 1791–1851, a native of Oporto, of Irish descent, entered the Royal Army in 1808, and became a Lieutenant of the 3d Dragoon Guards; published "an elegant and piquant satire," entitled Ball-Room Votaries, and contributed other satirical effusions (which resulted in his undertaking three duels) to a periodical called The Whim; in 1817 married Jemima Anne Deborah, second daughter of Sir S. Egerton Brydges, who died in 1822; in 1841 married the only daughter of the poet Wordsworth, (see QUILLINAN, MRS. DORA;) and again became a widower in 1847. For some years before his death Mr. Quillinan resided in the beautiful valley between Ambleside and Rydal, near the residence of Wordsworth, and rests near him in Grasmere Church. See Johnston's Memoir, (No. 7, infra;) Memoirs of Wm. Wordsworth, by his nephew, C. Wordsworth, 1851, 2 vols. 8vo; Lon. Gent. Mag., Oct. 1851, 438. He pub. many pieces in periodicals, and was the author of the following volumes: 1. Dunluce Castle; a Poem, Lee Priory Press, Kent, 1814, 4to. This was sarcastically reviewed by Captain Hamilton in Blackw. Mag., Oct. 1819, 574–579, (Poems by a Heavy Dragoon,) and the poet visited Edinburgh for the purpose of inviting his critic to the field. By a happy accident, however, they became excellent friends. Quin, James, 1693–1766, a native of London, long famous as an actor, is known to the bibliographer by a book, pub. anonymously, entitled Quin's Jests; or, The Facetious Man's Pocket Companion, Lon., 1766, 12mo. How many of these jests are properly ascribed to the rival of Garrick it would be difficult to ascertain. See The Life of Mr. James Quin, &c., 1766, 12mo; Davies's Life of Garrick; Galt's Lives of the Players.

"That sublime saying of Quin, . . . who, disputing on the execution of Charles I., and being asked by his antagonist by what law he was put to death, replied, 'By all the laws he had left them.' I wish you would translate it into Greek, and write it in your 'Longinus:' it has ten times more grandeur, force, and meaning than anything he cites."—Horace Walpole to Rev. W Mason, May, 1780: Letters, ed. 1861, vii. 360.

See Lon. Gent. Mag., April, 1843, 438, (Obituary.) 1. A Visit to Spain, 1822–23, Lon., 1823, 8vo; 2d ed., 8vo. Originally pub. in M. Herald.

"A sensible and impartial view."—Stevenson's Cat. of Voy. and Trav., No. 573.

"Written in a lively and agreeable manner, and with considerable powers of description. . . . Mr. Quin saw and wrote under the influence of much prejudice."—Edin. Rev., xl. 46, 47.

This review is ridiculed in Blackw. Mag., xv. 702–3. Blackwood, vol. xiv. 163–169, (see also 687,) commends the work warmly:

"It is unquestionably a safer guide to the feelings of the Spanish people, as well as a more honourable testimony to individual authorship, than any work that has hitherto appeared on the Peninsular Revolution."—169.

Quincy, Josiah, Feb. 23, 1744–April 26, 1775, a descendant of an ancient family who derived their name from a place in Normandy, (see the Roll of Battle Abbey, Matthew Paris, Camden, &c.,) a branch of which had been settled in Massachusetts since 1633, (the date of Edmund Quincy's emigration,) was a native of Boston; graduated at Harvard College, 1763; studied law with Oxenbridge Thacher, and in 1765 succeeded to his extensive practice; in 1767 he pub. in the Boston Gazette, under the signatures of Hyperion, and An Independent, Essays on the oppressive measures of the British Parliament; in 1770, in conjunction with his friend John Adams, defended Colonel Preston and his eight soldiers arraigned for murder committed on occasion of the "Boston massacre;" in 1771 and 1772 pub., in the Boston Gazette, patriotic Essays, under the signatures of Mentor, Edward Sexby, and Marchmont Needham; in May, 1774, pub. in Boston, (repub. in London same year, and commended in Monthly Review, August, p. 148,) Observations on the Act of Parliament commonly called the Boston Port Bill, &c., 8vo, (repub. in Memoirs of Josiah Quincy, Junior, by his son, Josiah Quincy, Bost., 1825, 8vo;) in September, 1774, embarked for London, and there zealously and ably laboured in the cause of American Independence; in March, 1775, re-embarked for Boston, and died (exclaiming, "Oh that I might live to render to my country one last service!") within sight of land, on the 26th of the ensuing month. See Quincy, Samuel M. No language within our capacity can do justice to the value of the patriotic services of this eminent man. Quincy, Josiah, LL.D., son of the preceding and of his wife, Abigail Phillips, b. in Boston, Mass., Feb. 4, 1772, graduated at Harvard College, 1790, and entered on the study and practice of the law; married Eliza Susan Morton, of New York, 1797; member of the Senate of Mass., and also Representative in the 9th National Congress, 1804, and for eight successive years, as a leader of the Federalists, opposed the Non-intercourse and Embargo Laws, the Declaration of War with England, (1812,) and other measures of the Administration; in 1813 declined a re-election to Congress, and was chosen a member of the Senate of Mass. until 1820, when he entered the Representative branch of the Legislature, and was twice elected Speaker; President of the Boston Athenæum, 1820 to 1830; Judge of the Municipal Court, 1822; Mayor of Boston (and one of the best who have ever filled that station in any city) from 1823 to 1828, when he declined a re-election; President of Harvard College from 1829 to 1845, when he resigned,—greatly to the regret of the friends of that noble institution. During his presidency the Law School, under Mr. Justice Story, was established, Dane and Gore Halls and the Astronomical Observatory were erected, and great improvements effected in the discipline and arrangements of the institution. 45. Essays on the Soiling of Cattle, illustrated by Experience, and an Address, containing Suggestions which may be useful to Farmers, 8vo, 1859; 2d ed., 1860; new ed., with a Memoir of the Author by Edmund Quincy, 1866, 8vo. Mr. Quincy is also the author of four articles in the Monthly Anthology, 1809–10, vols. vii. and viii., (reviews of the writings of Fisher Ames,) and of many papers in other periodicals. It will thus be seen, by the long catalogue of publications now recorded, that not only a zealous defence of the principles of political freedom has employed Mr. Quincy's ready pen, but that the promotion of the genial arts of peace, of statesmanship, of agriculture, of charity, and of letters, has distinguished every period of his long and honoured life.

"This young man," remarks Mrs. John Adams, in a letter written in the midst of Washington's family circle, where Mr. Quincy was a welcomed visitor, "is a rare instance of hereditary eloquence and ingenuity in the fourth generation. He comes into life with every advantage of family, fortune, and education; and I wish him all the success which such auguries naturally present to him in prospect."

The "auguries" have been well accomplished:

"Few men," it is the declaration of the eminent Judge Story, "have acquired so just a distinction for unspotted integrity, fearless justice, consistent principles, high talents, and extensive literature. Still fewer possess the merit of having justified the public confidence by the singleness of heart and purpose with which they have devoted themselves to the best interests of society."—Dedication of Story's Miscellaneous Works to the Hon. Josiah Quincy, LL.D., October, 1835.

It is an interesting fact that at the present moment—a quarter of a century since this honourable testimonial was given to the world—a son of Judge Story, equally conversant with the pen and the chisel, is engaged on a marble statue of Mr. Quincy for the Alumni of Harvard College. We trust that the artist will succeed as well as Mr. Wight, who painted the excellent portrait of the same original for the graduating class of Harvard College of 1829. Radcliffe, Anne, 1764–1823, the daughter of William Ward, was married in 1787 to William Radcliffe, a graduate of Oxford, a member of one of the Inns of Court, and subsequently proprietor of the English Chronicle. In 1794 she travelled on the Continent, and in the ensuing year gave the results of her observations to the public. Although distinguished for beauty, and the object of much curiosity after the publication of her second novel, she studiously avoided London society, and spent her time in excursions to favourite rural resorts and in the enjoyment of her quiet home, where she seems to have cared for little society in addition to her husband. Her character was exemplary, and "her piety, though cheerful, deep and sincere." Her publications appeared in the following order. 1. The Castles of Athlin and Dunbayne; a Highland Story, Lon., 1789, 12mo; new ed., 12mo. Not successful. 2. A Sicilian Romance, 1790, 2 vols. 12mo; new ed., 3 vols. 12mo. Successful. 3. The Romance of the Forest: interspersed with some Pieces of Poetry, 1791, 3 vols. 12mo; 1794, 3 vols. 12mo; new eds.: 3 vols. 12mo; 24mo; Phila., 2 vols. in 1, 32mo; N. York, 1857, 12mo. Mrs. Barbauld and some others seem to prefer this novel to the succeeding. 4. The Mysteries of Udolpho; a Romance: interspersed with Pieces of Poetry, Lon., 1794, 4 vols. 12mo. Sold to the bookseller for £500. Many British eds.; Phila., 3 vols. in 1, 24mo; N. York, 1857, 12mo. Sheridan and Fox praised this work in the warmest terms, and Dr. Joseph Warton sat up half the night to read it.

"The very name was fascinating, and the public, who rushed upon it with all the eagerness of curiosity, rose from it with unsated appetite. When a family was numerous, the volumes always flew, and were sometimes torn, from hand to hand, and the complaints of those whose studies were thus interrupted were a general tribute to the genius of the author. . . . In general the Mysteries of Udolpho was at its first appearance considered as a step beyond Mrs. Radcliffe's former work, [The Romance of the Forest,] high as that had justly advanced her. We entertain the same opinion in again reading them both, even after some years' interval. . . . With the majority of readers, the superior magnificence of landscape, and dignity of conception of character, secured the palm for the more recent work."—Sir Walter Scott: Life of Mrs. Radcliffe: Biographical Notices of Eminent Novelists.

"In order to raise strong emotions of fear and horror in the body of the work, the author is tempted to go to lengths to account for which the subsequent explanations seem utterly inadequate. Thus, for example, after all the wonder and dismay and terror and expectation excited by the mysterious chamber in the castle of Udolpho, how much are we disappointed and disgusted to find that all this pother has been raised by a waxen statue!"—Dunlop's History of Fiction.

"The mighty magician of the Mysteries of Udolpho, bred and nourished by the Florentine Muses in their sacred solitary caverns, amid the paler shrines of Gothick superstition, and in all the dreariness of enchantment; a poetess whom Ariosto would with rapture have acknowledged, and would have styled

"I was surprised, I confess, to find that she had succeeded so well, and failed so little."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Lit., 1810, 4to, 225.

6. The Italian; or, The Confessional of the Black Penitent: a Romance, 1797, 3 vols. 12mo. Sold to the bookseller for £800; new ed., 3 vols. 12mo. 7. Gaston de Blondeville; or, The Court of Henry III. resting in Ardennes, a Romance; St. Alban's Abbey, a Metrical Tale; with some Poetical Pieces; to which is prefixed a Memoir of the Author, [by Sir T. N. Talfourd,] with Extracts from her Journals, 1826, 4 vols. p. 8vo. Subsequently divided, (see Edin. Rev., lix. 327:) Gaston De Blondeville, 2 vols. 8vo; Poetical Works, 1834, 2 vols. 8vo; St. Alban's Abbey, a Metrical Tale, was pub. separately, Phila., 1826, 12mo. See Edin. Rev., lix. 328. Gaston De Blondeville (not written for publication) was announced in advance by Sir W. Scott, (Life of Mrs. Radcliffe,) and by Blackwood's Magazine, (xi. 331,) and on its appearance commended strongly by the British Press, the News of Literature, and the Literary Gazette, and faintly by Mrs. Elwood, (Memoirs of the Literary Ladies of England, i. 164;) but the Edinburgh Reviewer (lix. 337) declares that it is "quite unworthy of its predecessors."

Mrs. Radcliffe as a Prose Writer.

"The praise may be claimed for Mrs. Radcliffe of having been the first [?] to introduce into her prose fictions a beautiful and fanciful tone of natural description and impressive narrative which had hitherto been exclusively applied to poetry. Fielding, Richardson, Smollett, even Walpole, though writing upon an imaginative subject, are decidedly prose authors. Mrs. Radcliffe has a title to be considered as the first poetess of romantic fiction; that is, if actual rhythm shall not be deemed essential to poetry. . . . It may be true that Mrs. Radcliffe rather walks in fairy-land than in the region of realities, and that she has neither displayed the command of the human passions, nor the insight into the human heart, nor the observation of life and manners, which recommend other authors in the same line. But she has taken the lead in a line of composition appealing to those powerful and general sources of interest, a latent sense of supernatural awe, and curiosity concerning whatever is hidden and mysterious; and if she has been ever nearly approached in this walk, which we should hesitate to affirm, it is at least certain that she has never been excelled, or even equalled."—Sir Walter Scott: Life of Mrs. Radcliffe.

On a preceding page of the biographical sketch from which we have just quoted, Sir Walter throws out a few reflections on novel-reading which are well worth the consideration of the classes of critics for whom they are intended:

"Perhaps the perusal of such works may without injustice be compared with the use of opiates,—baneful when habitually and constantly resorted to, but of most blessed power in those moments of pain and languor when the whole head is sore and the whole heart sick. If those who rail indiscriminately at this species of composition were to consider the quantity of actual pleasure which it produces, and the much greater proportion of real sorrow and distress which it alleviates, their philanthropy ought to moderate their critical pride or religious intolerance."

This is a very modest estimate of the claims of fiction, which in all ages has been a most potent teacher, as well as physician, friend, and comforter; but let the principle of selection which prevails in the choice of our other domestic guests be not neglected with reference to those who may influence so powerfully our hearts or our imaginations: surely there is enough to satisfy the taste for fiction in the characters and descriptions of such writers as Scott, Austen, Edgeworth, Cooper, Thackeray, and Dickens, without resorting to the assassins, the libertines, the haunted castles, and the horrid dungeons of Radcliffe, of Lewis, of Maturin, and of Godwin! As regards the lawfulness of this instrumentality, an eminent critic, whose abundant stores of learning were always informed by the most wholesome common sense, remarks,

"His [Bunyan's] mind was now in a firm and healthy state. He saw that in employing fiction to make truth clear and goodness attractive, he was only following the example which every Christian ought to propose to himself; and he determined to print [his Pilgrim's Progress.]"—Lord Macaulay: Life of John Bunyan: Encyc. Brit., 8th ed., v., 1854.

We continue our citations of opinions on our author:

"We would not pass over without a tribute of gratitude Mrs. Radcliffe's wild and wondrous tales. When we read them, the world seems shut out, and we breathe only in an enchanted region, where lovers' lutes tremble over placid waters, mouldering castles rise conscious of deeds of blood, and the sad voices of the past echo through deep vaults and lonely galleries. There is always majesty in her terrors. She produces more effect by whispers and slender hints than ever was attained by the most vivid display of horrors. Her conclusions are tame and impotent almost without example. But, while her spells actually operate, her power is truly magical. . . . Of all romance-writers, Mrs. Radcliffe is the most romantic."—Sir T. Noon Talfourd: New Monthly Mag.: repub. in his Miscellaneous Writings.

"Her descriptions of scenery, indeed, are vague and wordy to the last degree; they are neither like Salvator nor Claude, nor nature nor art; and she dwells on the effects of moonlight till we are sometimes weary of them; her characters are insipid,—the shadows of a shade, continued on, under different names, through all her novels; her story comes to nothing. But in harrowing up the soul with imaginary horrors, and making the flesh creep and the nerves thrill with fond hopes and fears, she is unrivalled among her fair countrywomen. Her great power lies in describing the indefinable, and embodying a phantom. She makes her readers twice children. . . . All the fascination that links the world of passion to the world unknown is hers, and she plays with it at her pleasure: she has all the poetry of romance, all that is obscure, visionary, and objectless in the imagination."—Hazlitt: Lect. on the English Novelists.

"The Shakspeare of Romance-writers, who to the wild Landscape of Salvator Rosa has added the softer graces of a Claude.'—Dr. Drake.

"Miss Edgeworth would scarcely venture into the region of the picturesque; and Mrs. Radcliffe is good for nothing out of it, except, indeed, when she is in her horrors."—Wm. H. Prescott, the historian: N. Amer. Rev., July, 1832, 188.

"The mysterious inventions of Mrs. Radcliffe and her ghostly school."—Ibid.: Miscell., 1855, 589.

"His [Scott's] are not luxuriant and glowing pictures of imaginary beauty, like those of Mrs. Radcliffe, having no resemblance to actual nature, but faithful and graphic portraits of real scenes, drawn with the eye of a poet but the fidelity of a consummate draughtsman. . . . The novels of Charlotte Smith and Mrs. Radcliffe . . . are now wellnigh unreadable."—Sir Archibald Alison: Blackw. Mag., March, 1832, and Sept. 1845; repub. in his Essays, 1850, iii. 5, 529.

"She seems to be born to move those passions which form the interest of common novels: she alarms the soul with terror, agitates it with suspense, prolonged and wrought up to the most intense feeling by mysterious hints and obscure intimations of unseen danger."—Mrs. Barbauld.

After an eloquent summing up of the characteristics of Mrs. Radcliffe's novels, an agreeable writer thus concludes:

"Anne Radcliffe and her mysterious triumph. But all this, though impressive, and sometimes grand, is unnatural: such fictions could not last: they were not of God, and so they failed. The authoress lived long enough to see the fabric which she had reared melt away, and Nature resume her reign with the same ease and quietness that the moon succeeds the tempest."—Allan Cunningham: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the Last Fifty Years, 1833.

Mrs. Radcliffe as a Poetess.

"The warmth of imagination which Mrs. Radcliffe manifests was naturally connected with an inclination towards poetry; and accordingly songs, sonnets, and pieces of fugitive verse amuse and relieve the reader in the course of her volumes. [This was written before the publication of her Poems in 1826, supra.] These are not in this place the legitimate subject of criticism; but it may be remarked that they display more liveliness and richness of fancy than correctness of taste or felicity of expression."—Sir W. Scott: Life of Mrs. Radcliffe.

"The pieces of verses interspersed in her various romances display the same peculiar powers which characterize her prose compositions; they are marked by great energy of imagination, and rich eloquence of style."—Rowton's Female Poets of G. Brit., 1848, 271.

The following opinions refer to the collective edition of her Poems pub. in 1826, and again in 1834, (supra.) Perhaps Leigh Hunt intends a wider application.

"Though some of these performances are above the common run of verses, it is to her prose works she must trust for her name being handed down to posterity as a first-rate writer in her peculiar line."—Mrs. Elwood: Life of Mrs. Radcliffe.

"We must now bid adieu to these poems. They are little calculated, certainly, to increase the reputation of Mrs. Radcliffe; and perhaps her friends would have acted more judiciously if they had allowed them to remain in that obscurity in which they were left by their amiable authoress. . . . There seem to be some who are poets in prose, but whose poetry forsakes them the moment they attempt to embody their ideas in verse; and one of these undoubtedly was Mrs. Radcliffe."—Edin. Rev., July, 1834, 337–340.

"Mrs. Radcliffe's verses are unworthy of her romances. In the latter she was what Mr. Mathias called her, 'a mighty magician;'—or, not to lose the fine sound of his whole phrase, 'the mighty magician of Udolpho,' [supra.] In her verses she is a tinselled nymph in a pantomime, calling up commonplaces with a wand."—Leigh Hunt: Men, Women, and Books, vol. ii.: Specimens of British Poets, (Rev. A. Dyce's, 1827.) See, also, Lon. Month. Rev., cx. 280; U. S. Lit. Gaz., vi. 1.

The reader will find further details respecting Mrs. Radcliffe and her works in the Memoirs of Talfourd and Mrs. Elwood above referred to, and a short and imperfect notice of her career (in 1858) in Jeaffreson's Novels and Novelists, ii. 1–6.

Rainoldes, Rainolds, Raynolds, Reginaldus, or Reynolds, John, D.D., 1549–1607, a native of Pinhoe, Devonshire, England; became a student of Merton College, Oxford, 1562; was admitted to Corpus Christi College, 1563, and there chosen Probationer Fellow, 1566; Dean of Lincoln, 1593; President of Corpus Christi College, (for which office he refused a bishopric,) 1598. It was chiefly by the influence of this great Hebraist that King James ordered the new translation of the Bible, of which he made a small portion and criticised (at the weekly meetings of the translators in his chambers) much more. He pub. a number of separate sermons, treatises, against the Church of Rome, and some other theological productions, for a list of which see Wood's Athen. "The most eminently learned man of the queen's reign seems to have been Dr. John Rainolds; and a foreign author of the last century, Colomies, places him among the first six [the other five are Usher, Gataker, Blondel, Petit, and Bochart] in copiousness of erudition whom the Protestant churches had produced. Rale, Ralle, or Rasles, Sebastian, a Jesuit, b. 1657 or 1658, in the province of Franche-Comté, arrived at Quebec, Oct. 1689, and laboured as a missionary among the Indians until 1724, when, with about thirty Indians, he was killed by a party of English. He compiled a Dictionary of the Abnaki Language, (1691, 4to, pp. 500,) the MS. of which is in the Harvard College Library. It was pub. in 1833 in the New Series of the Memoirs of the American Academy, vol. i., edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by John Pickering, LL.D., who, in the Appendix to his Orthography of the Indian Languages of North America, 1818, had expressed a strong desire (in which Baron William von Humboldt and other philologists united) to see it in print. Ralegh, Carew, 1604–1666, son of Sir Walter Ralegh, first saw the light in the Tower of London, where his father was a prisoner, and was educated at Wadham College, Oxford; was obliged to accept the reversion of his mother's pension (£400) instead of his inheritance; married the widow of Sir Anthony Ashley, (by whom he had two sons and three daughters,) and was soon afterwards made one of the Gentlemen of the King's Privy Chamber; in 1659, by the favour of General Monk, was appointed Governor of Jersey. In 1645 he wrote (see Howell's Letters) a vindication of his father against statements made by James Howell relative to the mine-affair at Guiana; and was also author of: 1. Observations on [Wm.] Sanderson's History of King James, 1656. Sanderson responded in—An Answer to a Scurrilous Pamphlet, &c., 1656, 4to. 2. A Brief Relation of Sir Walter Ralegh's Troubles, &c., 1669, 4to. Written with the view of regaining his inheritance. Ralegh, Philip, a grandson of Sir Walter Ralegh, prepared for publication his grandfather's Remains, his Premonition to Princes, and probably the Abridgment of his History of the World. See Ralegh, Sir Walter.

Ralegh, Raleigh, Rawly, Rawley, Raughleye, Rawleygh, or Raweleigh, Sir Walter, 1552–1618, the second son of Walter Ralegh and his third wife, Catherine, daughter of Sir Philip Champernoun, and widow of Otho Gilbert, Esq., (father by her of Sir John, Sir Adrian, and Sir Humphrey Gilbert,) first opened his eyes on his father's farm, called Haye's, in the parish of East Budleigh, near the coast of Devonshire. He was entered a commoner of Oriel College, Oxford, in or about 1568; in 1569 enrolled himself with the volunteer corps which, under Henry Champernoun, visited France to fight the battles of the Huguenots; served five years in France, and subsequently in the Netherlands under the Prince of Orange; in 1579 accompanied his half-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, on an expedition to North America, from which he returned without success; in 1580 was captain of a company of the royal troops sent to Ireland to suppress the Earl of Desmond's rebellion; in 1581 was associated with Sir William Morgan in the government of Munster; in 1582, by a good use of his dress and address, ingratiated himself with Queen Elizabeth, and was shortly afterwards knighted, made Captain of the Guard, Seneschal of the County of Cornwall, and Lord Warden of the Stannaries; also received a grant of 12,000 acres of the forfeited estates of the Earl of Desmond, and a lucrative patent for licensing the vendors of wine in England; in 1583 subscribed £2000 to the unfortunate expedition which cost Gilbert his life, (see Gilbert, Sir Humphrey, supra;) in 1584 obtained a patent empowering him to appropriate, plant, and govern any territories that he might acquire in North America, (see Harriott, or Harriot, Thomas, supra, and authorities there cited;) in 1587, after expending £40,000 in his attempt to colonize Virginia, transferred his patent to a company of merchants and others, and in the same year was appointed one of the Council of War, and had command of the forces in Cornwall, of which county he was Lieutenant-General; in 1588 furnished a ship and men to the expedition against the Spanish Armada, and was rewarded by an augmentation of his patent on wines, and the right to lay tonnage and poundage on them; in 1589 accompanied the Lisbon expedition under Drake and Norris, and on his return home visited Spenser the poet at the castle of Kilcolman, in Ireland, (see Spenser's Colin Clovts Come Home Againe;) in 1592 sailed with fifteen ships to intercept the Spanish fleet, but was recalled by the Queen, and on his return was imprisoned in the Tower in consequence of an intrigue with Miss Elizabeth (daughter of Sir Nicholas) Throgmorton, one of the Queen's Maids of Honour, (also sent to the Tower,) who became his devoted wife; after a short banishment from the court, during which he projected the discovery and conquest of El Dorado, on February 5th, 1595, he sailed from Plymouth with five vessels; arrived at Trinidad about the end of March; surprised the town of San Josef and captured the Governor, and ascended the Orinoco about sixty leagues; returned to England towards the end of summer, and in the next year delighted the world with his Discoverie of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empyre of Guiana, 4to, pp. 112, (Latine, Norib., 1599, 4to; Dutch, 1612, 4to; and in Hakluyt's Collections, &c.;) in 1595 was employed, with the rank of rear-admiral, at the taking of Cadiz, where he was wounded in the leg; in 1597 took Fayal, and about the same time was restored to his post of Captain of the Guard, and appointed Governor of Jersey; as a member of the House of Commons, gained favour by his advocacy of the free use of capital and labour, but as a politician incurred severe censure by his ungenerous hostility to the Earl of Essex and his abuse of his own Court interest in his treatment of Essex's adherents; on the accession of James I. fell into disgrace and danger; was committed to the Tower, on a charge of complicity with Cobham's treason, July, 1602, and tried and found guilty on that indictment, September, 1603; was deprived of his estates in favour of Carr, afterwards Duke of Somerset, and lay a prisoner in the Tower for thirteen years, during which he composed his greatest work, the History of the World, and many minor productions; in 1615, by bribery of great men, and a promise to open a mine in Guiana, was released conditionally from prison, and subsequently equipped thirteen vessels for his American expedition; reached the coast of Guiana in November, 1617, and, being himself too unwell to ascend the Orinoco, despatched Captain Lawrence Keymis, who for twenty days (after an assault on St. Thomas, in which Raleigh's son was slain) searched unsuccessfully for the coveted mine, and committed suicide shortly after his return; arrived at Plymouth, July, 1618, and was arrested by Sir Lewis Stukley, (q. v.,) Vice-Admiral of Devonshire; adjudged by the Council (who desired to please the King of England and King of Spain) to be civilly dead by virtue of his former sentence, (September, 1603;) received sentence of death before the Court of King's Bench, October 28th, 1618, and beheaded the next morning, dying like a soldier and a Christian, in the sixty-sixth year of his age.

The sad tidings of the execution of this great man were received by the people of England with execrations so loud, deep, and long-continued that a venal council and an ungrateful king were at length alarmed, and made a lame attempt to justify their cruel deed:

"The dissatisfaction at the proceedings against Sir Walter was so general and public, that, in order to appease it, the King found it expedient to vindicate himself in a private declaration, [A Declaration of the Demeanor and Carriage of Sir Walter Raleigh, Knighte, &c., Lon., 1618, 4to, pp. 68; J. Lilly's Bibl. Anglo-Curiosa, 1869, 108, £1 4*s*. Reprinted in Harl. Miscell., vol. iii.,] setting forth every minute particular that could be urged in his own favour. This paper appeared in public, signed with the names of nine Privy-Counsellors; yet did it not prove sufficient to allay the murmurs of the people, several of those particulars being observed to be misrepresented, and others appeared in a great measure aggravated. Hence the cry still continued that Raleigh was sacrificed to the Spaniard."—Life of Raleigh, in Biog. Brit., 1760, v. 3483.

And so, undoubtedly, he was; and this can be well maintained without the necessity of proving that he who thus died a martyr always lived a saint. But we shall, ere we have done with this article, refer the reader to abundant sources of information—inculpatory, exculpatory, censorious, and eulogistic—respecting this eminent character,—one of the most distinguished in the English annals.

"He was a tall, handsome, and bold man," remarks an ancient chronicler; "but his nævе [blemish, or weakness] was that he was damnable proud: he had a most remarkable aspect; an exceeding high forehead, long-faced, and 'sour cie-lidded, a kind of pigge-eie.' . . . I have heard my gr. mother say that when she was young they were wont to talk of this rebus, viz.:

'The enemie to the stomach and the word of disgrace
Is the name of a gentleman with a bold face.'

. . . When the English noblesse mett and received him, [King James,] being told upon their presentment to his majesty their names, when Sir W. R.'s name was told, 'Raleigh,' said the King, 'On my soule, mon, I have rawly heard of thee.' . . . He tooke a pipe of tobacco a little before he went to the scaffold, which some formall persons were scandalized at, but I think 'twas well and properly donne, to settle his spirits."—Minutes of Lives, by John Aubrey, Esq., 1680.

Sir Walter was, as before remarked, the author of many works, and the reputed author of others, some of which he probably never saw. In the lists of Oldys and Birch in their Lives of Raleigh, (see, also, Biog. Brit., 1760, v. 484,) and that by Wood, augmented by Bliss, (Athen. Oxon., ed. 1813–20, ii. 240–249,) together with the late authorities noticed below, the bibliographer will find enough to perplex his judgment, and the scholar much to gratify his taste. The catalogue of the contents of the only edition of his writings which can pretend to any thing like completeness—The Works of Sir Walter Raleigh, Kt., now first collected; to which are prefixed the Lives of the Author, by Oldys and Birch, Oxford, 1829, 8 vols. 8vo, £3 15*s*., in sheets—runs as follows: vol. i., Advertisement; Life, by William Oldys; Life, by Thomas Birch, M.A.; The Trial of Sir W. Raleigh: Speech and Behaviour on the Scaffold; vols. ii.–vii., History of the World, [with Chronological Tables and Index, in vol. vii.;] vol. viii., Maxims of State; The Cabinet Council, containing The Chief Arts of Empire; The Prerogative of Parliaments; On a Match between Lady Elizabeth and the Prince of Piedmont; On a Marriage between Prince Henry and a Daughter of Savoy; A Discourse of War in General; A Discourse touching a War with Spain; A Discourse of the Invention of Ships, Anchors, Compass, &c.; Observations on the Navy and Sea Service; Observations touching Trade and Commerce; The Discovery of Guiana; Apology for his Voyage to Guiana; The Reign of William I.; On the Seat of Government; Causes of the Magnificence and Opulence of Cities; The Sceptic; Instructions to his Son and to Posterity; A Treatise of the Soul; A Discourse of Tenures which were before the Conquest; Letters; Additional Correspondence; A Relation of Cadiz Action, 1596; Spanish Alarum, 1596; Orders to Commanders; The Advice of a Loving Son to his Aged Father; Poems.

RALEIGH AS A PROSE WRITER.

"Mark when a bold expressive thought appears,
Bright through the rubbish of some hundred years;
Command old words that long have slept to wake,— Words that wise Bacon or brave Raleigh spake."
POPE: Imitations of Horace, book ii., Epist. ii.

Raleigh's Maxims of State, The Cabinet Council, The Sceptic, and Advice to his Son, and his History of the World, are about all of his prose works now known (we do not venture to say familiar) to students of English literature. The critic of the Retrospective Review, in an article on his Remains, already referred to, remarks,

"Sir Walter Raleigh's thoughts are astute, and his language pregnant and expressive. There is something captivating in the mixture we find in his writings of forcible and uncommon thought and striking metaphor, which are so amalgamated as to be inseparable. The one is not appended to the other for the sake of ornament, but is its natural language, and is as necessary to its existence as the bark to the tree.

"His Advice to his Son in the Choice of a Wife is so excellent in its kind, that we shall introduce the whole of it: though, to say the truth, it betrays almost as much cunning as wisdom. . . . His rules for the preservation of a man's estate are equally pertinent and just, although it cannot be denied that they savour of a sad experience and worldliness. . . . Sir Walter is very severe on the vice of drunkenness. . . . The Skeptic is a piece of ingenious sophistry, which displays the versatility of the author's mind. . . . This collection also contains several of Sir Walter Raleigh's Letters, amongst which there are two to his wife, which manifest great kindness and affection. The one written after his condemnation is so beautiful and affecting, that we shall introduce a portion of it in this place."—Vol. ii., 1820, 329, 331, 332, 336, 339.

We proceed to notice our author's principal production:

THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD, Part 1, extending to the End of the Macedonian Empire, [B.C. 167,] Lon., 1614, fol., (see Gent. Mag., Oct. 1851, 391; Drake's Ralegh, 7, n.;) 1628, fol.; 1652, fol.; 1666, fol.; 1670, fol.; with his Life and Trial, 1677, fol.; 1687, fol.; with his Life by Wm. Oldys, and Trial, 11th ed., and the best of the old eds., 1736, 2 vols. fol. Alexander Ross pub. Animadversions, &c. on this work, 1653, 8vo, and strictures upon it in his Marrow of History, 2d ed., 1662, 8vo, preceded, in 1652, by The History of the World, the Second Part, in Six Books; being a Continuation of Sir Walter Raleigh's, folio. This is not commended by Granger:

"Our author's [Ross's] great work is 'A Continuation of Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World.' This is like a piece of bad Gothic tacked to a magnificent pile of Roman architecture, which serves to heighten the effect of it, while it exposes its own deficiency in strength and beauty."—Biog. Hist. of Eng., 5th ed., 1824, iii. 323.

An Abridgment of Raleigh's History of the World, (see RALEGH, PHILIP,) together with his Premonition to Princes, appeared in 1698, 8vo; again, 1700, 8vo; 1702, 8vo; 4th ed., with a Continuation, 1708, 4 vols. 8vo. The whole work was repub., together with the Voyage to Guiana, (ut supra,) in 1820, 6 vols. 8vo; and again in the collective ed. of his Works, (vols. ii.–vii.,) 1829, 8 vols. 8vo. There is an absurd story—still repeated by moralizing anecdotists who insist upon garnishing truisms with platitudes, to the unbounded admiration of family circles and festal convocations—that Raleigh had completed a Second Part of his History, reaching to his own period, but that his disgust at the discrepancies of testimony on the part of two persons who had, with himself, just witnessed an occurrence in the Tower, caused him to throw his manuscripts into the fire, protesting that it was not worth while to attempt to faithfully represent the past, when it seemed impossible to obtain a correct relation of the present. That a man of the historian's large experience should have been obliged to wait until his sixty-second year for his first doubt of the infallibility of human testimony is not the least remarkable fact connected with his extraordinary career.

It is proper to quote some opinions respecting the merits of Raleigh's History of the World,—not omitting to notice, in passing, that Mr. Disraeli's suspicions (Secret History of Rawleigh's History of the World) that the knight's share in the work was much less than is generally supposed, seem to have been dissipated, in public estimation, by Bolton Corney, (New Curiosities of Literature,) P. F. Tytler, (Life of Raleigh,) and Macvey Napier, (Lord Bacon and Sir Walter Raleigh.) This being assumed, it is fair to again present in evidence the commendation of the historian of England, which Mr. Disraeli endeavoured to have ruled out of court as founded upon a misapprehension of the premises:

"They were struck with the extensive genius of the man who, being educated amidst naval and military enterprises, had surpassed in the pursuits of literature even those of the most recluse and sedentary lives; and they admired his unbroken magnanimity, which, at his age and under his circumstances could engage him to undertake and execute so great a work as his History of the World."—HUME: Hist. of England, ch. xlvii.

Again:

"Raleigh is the best model of that ancient style which some would revive at present."—Ibid., ch. xlix., Appendix.

We continue our quotations.

"Hos autem sequi possunt nonnulli ex recentioribus: quos inter, principem locum obtinere meretur Gualterus Raulæus nostras, eques auratus, vir clari nominis, et ob singularem fortitudinem ac prudentiam meliori fato dignus. Is universalem historiam ab initio mundi usque Macedonici imperii, sive tertiæ monarchiæ occasum, ex probatissimis auctoribus coagmentavit, nostræ quidem gentis idiomate vernaculo, sed accurato admodum judicio, methodo perspicua, stylo eleganti ac virili," &c.—DEGORY WHEARE: Lect. Hiernal. de Ratione et Methodo Legendi Hist. Civ. et Eccles., (Lon., 1623, 8vo, &c.,) Sect. vi.

"Sir Walter Raleigh has, in my opinion, treated ancient history with more strength and dignity than any other modern writer of any other nation."—SPELMAN.

"Take heede of an unactive and vaine spirit—recreate yourself with Sir Walter Raughleye's Historie; its a bodie of historie, and will add much more to your understanding than fragments of storie."—O. CROMWELL: Letter to his son Richard, April, 1650.

"The attempt of Raleigh is deservedly celebrated for the labour of his researches and the elegance of his style; but he has endeavoured to exert his judgment more than his genius, to select facts rather than to adorn them, and has produced a historical dissertation, but seldom risen to the majesty of history."—Dr. Johnson: Rambler, No. 122.

"The History of Sir Walter Raleigh must place him in our esteem, when we consider the barbarous language with which he struggled."—R. Polwhele: Goodhugh's E. G. Lib. Man., 165.

"The design was equal to the greatness of his mind, and the execution to the strength of his parts and the variety of his learning. His style is pure, nervous, and majestic, and much better suited to the dignity of history than that of Lord Bacon. Raleigh seems to have written for posterity; Bacon, for the reign of James the First. . . . This admirable work of Raleigh has been thought a just model for the reformation of our language."—Granger: Biog. Hist. of Eng., 5th ed., 1824, ii. 140.

"His digressions are never more agreeable than when they become dissertations; the most ordinary events of history assume a new face by the noble speculations which he builds on them,—full of a searching critical spirit, of sound morality, and of practical policy; often profound, always eloquent."—Disraeli: Amen. of Lit.: Psychological Hist. of Rawleigh.

"His unfinished History of the World leaves us to regret that later ages had not been celebrated by his eloquence."—Ibid.: Curiosities of Lit.: Imprisonment of the Learned.

Disraeli also remarks,

"He who wishes for power of intellect and grandeur of soul must study profoundly Raleigh's History of the World;"

and he declares (Amen. of Lit.) that

"the most material characteristic of his work Rawleigh could borrow from no one,—the tone and elevation of his genius."

And this citation brings us back for a moment to the suspicions announced with so much confidence by Mr. Disraeli and disputed with equal courage by the critics Corney, Tytler, and Napier. From the last-named we must quote at least one sentence on this subject:

"We hold it to be demonstrable, by a critical examination of the work itself, that it is throughout the composition of a single mind; bearing, as it does, in every paragraph, the impress of a unity and identity of literary labour which could only exist in the workmanship of one and the same hand. By no analysis of its structure, sequences, and wording could it possibly be shown that there are in it any differences of composition justifying the ascription of passages of one order to Raleigh and the rest to others."—Edin. Rev., April, 1840, 70: Sir Walter Raleigh.

"Of its style, the fine passages above extracted will partly furnish the means of judging; but it would be necessary to peruse in continuation some considerable portion of the narrative on Greek and Roman affairs, to have any just conception of its easy and equable flow, its clearness and animation, its sweetness and melody in the plaintive parts, and its general strength and dignity. In the structure of his periods there was no writer of his age so entirely free from stiffness and pedantry."—Ibid., 68.

"Vigorous, purely English, and possessing an antique richness of ornament similar to what pleases us when we see some ancient priory or stately manor-house and compare it with our modern mansions. The work is laborious without being heavy, learned without being dry, acute and ingenious without degenerating into the subtle but trivial distinctions of the Schoolmen. Its narrative is clear and spirited, and the matter collected from the most authentic sources. . . . But perhaps its most striking feature is the sweet tone of philosophic melancholy which pervades the whole. Written in prison during the quiet evening of a tempestuous life, we feel, in its perusal, that we are the companions of a superior mind, nursed in contemplation, and chastened and improved by sorrow, in which the bitter recollection of injury and the asperity of resentment have passed away, leaving only the heavenly lesson that all is vanity."—P. F. Tytler: Life of Sir Walter Raleigh.

Warburton thought that the concluding paragraphs ("By this which we have already set down," &c.) had never been equalled by any writer but Milton; and Lord Grenville esteemed the apostrophe

"'O eloquent, just, and mighty Death!' one of the finest, if not the finest, passage in English prose."—Rogers's Recollec., 1859, 155.

Mr. Rogers also tells us that the fastidious Charles James Fox allowed Raleigh to be a very fine writer, (ubi supra, 43.)

"The great historians of this period, who condescended to use their native tongue, were Raleigh, Hayward, Knolles, Bacon, and Daniel; writers who, in this province, still hold no inferior rank among the classics of their country. The 'History of the World,' by Sir Walter, exhibits great strength of style and much solidity of judgment."—Dr. Drake: Shaksp. and his Times, 1817, i. 476.

"Raleigh's History of the World is a proof of the respect for laborious learning that had long distinguished Europe. . . . The Greek and Roman story is told more fully and exactly than by any earlier English author, and with a plain eloquence which has given this book a classical reputation in our language, though from its length, and the want of that critical sifting of facts which we now justly demand, it is not greatly read. . . . There is little now obsolete in the words of Raleigh, nor, to any great degree, in his turns of phrase; the periods, when pains have been taken with them, show that artificial structure which we find in Sidney and Hooker; he is less pedantic than most of his contemporaries, seldom low, never affected."—Hallam: Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 149.

Raleigh as a Poet.

To an eminent bibliographer, whose services to English literature are commended on a preceding page, (272,) we are indebted for Poems of Sir Walter Raleigh, now first Collected; with a Biographical and Critical Introduction, by Sir S. E. Brydges, Kent, Lee Priory Press, 1813, 4to; Lon., Longman's Private Press, 1814, 12mo. In 1845 appeared, in 1 vol. fp. 8vo, Poems by Sir Henry Wotton, Sir Walter Raleigh, and others; edited by the Rev. John Hannah, late Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford. See Lon. Athen., 1846, 11, and 1861, i. 424, 469. Among the best-known of Raleigh's poems are The Country's Recreations; A Vision upon the Concert of Spenser's Faerie Queene; The Nymph's Reply to the Passionate Shepherd, (authorship questioned;) The Excuse written by Sir Walter Raleigh in his Younger Years; and Sir Walter Raleigh in the Unquiet Rest of his Last Sickness. The last two are not in Brydges's collection, for which omission Dr. Drake takes the editor to task.

"For amatory sweetness and pastoral simplicity," observes the Doctor, "few efforts will be found to surpass the poems distinguished as 'Phillida's Love-Call,' 'The Shepherd's Description of Love,' the 'Answer to Marlowe,' and 'The Silent Lover.'"—Shaksp. and his Times, i. 640. See, also, 573, 639.

"For dittie and amourous ode I finde Sir Walter Rawleygh's vayne most loftie, insolent, [unusual,] and passionate."—Puttenham: Arte of English Poesie.

"The English poems of Sir Walter Raleigh are not easily to be mended."—Bolton.

"A votary of whom the Muses cannot but be proud."—Headley.

"Do I pronounce Raleigh a poet? Not, perhaps, in the judgment of a severe criticism. Raleigh, in his better days, was too much occupied in action to have cultivated all the powers of a poet, which require solitude and perpetual meditation, and a refinement of sensibility, such as intercourse with business and the world deadens. . . . We have no proof that Raleigh possessed the copious, vivid, and creative powers of Spenser; nor is it probable that any cultivation would have brought forth from him fruit equally rich. But even in the careless fragments now presented to the reader I think we can perceive some traits of attraction and excellence which perhaps even Spenser wanted. If less diversified than that gifted bard, he would, I think, have sometimes been more forcible and sublime. His images would have been more gigantic, and his reflections more daring."—Sir S. E. Brydges: Biog. and Crit. Introduc. to Raleigh's Poems, 1813, 4to.

See, also, Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ii. 152; H. Neele's Lects. on Eng. Poet., Lect. VI.; Ed. Rev., xlii. 53.

We conclude with Raleigh's Characteristics.

"How much he excelled, both in feats of arms and in strength of counsel, has been seen in the course of this memoir; and for arts we need but peruse the books he wrote in the poetical, epistolary, military, maritimal, geographical, political, philosophical, and historical way; the number, as well as value, of which is so great, that, considering his continual avocations, it becomes matter of wonder how he could find time to collect so much force of mind and attention as was necessary to write them. But the wonder ceases when we know the division he made of the day, four hours only of which he allowed to sleep, and for the rest he dedicated four hours to reading and study, two to discourse, and the remainder to business and other necessaries. He had an excellent library, which was of use sometimes to Mr. Selden, and others of the Society of Antiquaries, of which he was a member."—Dr. Birch: Life of Raleigh, in Biog. Brit., v., (1760,) 3484.

"A man of so great abilities that neither that nor the preceding reign produced his equal. His character was a combination of almost every eminent quality; he was the soldier, statesman, and scholar united; and had he lived with the heroes of antiquity he would have made a just parallel to Cæsar and Xenophon,—like them being equal master of the sword and the pen."—Cibber's Lives, i., (1753,) 199.

"'The sons of Heth said unto Abraham, Thou art a great prince amongst us, in the choice of our sepulchres bury thy dead, none shall withhold them from thee.' So may we say to the memory of this worthy knight, 'Repose yourself in this our catalogue under what topic you please, of statesman, seaman, soldier, learned writer, and what not.' His work unlocks our choicest cabinets, and provides both room and welcome to entertain him. . . . Indeed, it was true of him what was said of Cato Uticensis, 'that he seemed to be born to that only which he went about,' so dexterous was he in all his undertakings, in court, in camp, by sea, by land, with sword, with pen; witness in the last his 'History of the World,' wherein the only default (or defect rather) [was] that it wanted one-half thereof."—Fuller: Worthies of Eng., ed. 1840, i. 419.

See, also, the life of Raleigh, prefixed to his History of the World, ed. 1614.

"Sir Walter Raleigh, the most extraordinary genius of his own or perhaps any other time: a penetrating statesman, an accomplished courtier, a deep scholar, a fine writer, a fine soldier, and one of the ablest seamen in the world. This vast genius that pierced so far and ran through so many things was of a fiery, eccentric kind, which led him into daring expeditions and uncommon projects, which not being understood by a timid prince, and envied and hated by the rivals he had in so many ways of life, ruined him at last."—Account of the European Set- ements in America, 2d ed., 1758, ii. 217. See BURKE, EDMUND, p. 289.

"Sir Walter Raleigh, . . . one of the most extraordinary men that ever appeared in a country abounding in singular characters. . . . He was passionately fond of every thing that was magnificent, he enjoyed a reputation superior to that of the greatest men, he had more knowledge than those whose immediate pursuit was learning, he possessed a freedom of thinking uncommon in those days, and had a kind of romantic turn in his sentiments and behaviour."—ABBÉ RAYNAL: European Settlements in the W. and E. Indies, vi. 21.

"After a lapse of nearly two centuries, [in 1792,] the State of North Carolina by a solemn act of legislation revived in its capital 'the City of Raleigh,' thus expressing its grateful respect for the memory of the extraordinary man who limited in himself as many kinds of glory as were ever combined in an individual."—GEORGE BANCROFT: Hist. of the U. States, ii., chap. 3.

"It is by a frequent contemplation of such lofty and splendid specimens of humanity as Sir Walter Raleigh that the modern character may be elevated and invigorated. . . . Surely there is something to be learnt from a man like this,—admiral, philosopher, statesman, historian, and poet, all in one,—first in some, distinguished in all; who, bold and adventurous in discovery, whether moral or geographical, untamed in war and indefatigable in literature, as inexhaustible in ideas as in exploits, after having brought a new world to light, wrote the history of the old in a prison."—Lon. Retrospec. Rev., ii., 1820, 340. See, also, vii., 1823, 317.

"There is no object in human pursuits which the genius of Raleigh did not embrace. What science was that unwearying mind not buried in? What arts of hoar antiquity did he not love to seek? What sense of the beautiful ever passed transiently over his spirit? His books and his pictures ever accompanied him in his voyages. Even in the short hour before his last morning, is he not still before us, while his midnight pen traces his mortuary verse, perpetuating the emotions of the sage, and of the hero who could not fear death!"—DISRAELI: Amen. of Lit.: Psychological Hist. of Rawleigh.

"Raleigh, the soldier, the sailor, the scholar, the courtier, the orator, the poet, the historian, the philosopher; whom we picture to ourselves sometimes reviewing the Queen's guards, sometimes giving chase to a Spanish galleon, then answering the chiefs of the country party in the House of Commons, then again murmuring one of his sweet love-songs too near the ears of her Highness's maids of honour, and soon after poring over the Talmud, or collating Polybius with Livy."—LORD MACAULAY: Edin. Rev., April, 1832, and in his Crit. and Hist. Essays, ed. 1854, i. 496.

It will be remembered that the author of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, long before the inception of that immortal production, after successively choosing and rejecting for historical treatment the Crusade of Richard the First, the Barons' Wars against John and Henry the Third, the History of Edward the Black Prince, the Lives and Comparisons of Henry V. and the Emperor Titus, the Life of Philip Sydney and that of the Marquis of Montrose, thus announces his resolution:

"At length I have fixed on Sir Walter Raleigh for my hero. His eventful story is varied by the characters of the soldier and the sailor, the courtier and historian; and it may afford such a fund of materials as I desire, which have not yet been properly manufactured."—Gibbon's Miscell. Works, ed. 1837, 68, 439.

After nearly a twelvemonth of preliminary investigation, (vide p. 70, ut supra,) this hero, too, was dropped, (for insufficient reasons, we think,) and thus the world lost that which would have certainly been a great, what could not have been a satisfactory, performance. The time to write the Life of Raleigh had not then arrived: it is now here: "The hour's come, but where's the man?" What a grand prospect opens to the imagination when we contemplate the title—The Life and Times of Sir Walter Raleigh! For—let it never be forgotten so long as it remains true!—the literary and political history of the reign of Elizabeth is as yet unwritten. We shall not pause to offer the evidence; for he who would ask for the proof could hardly comprehend it if presented. See SAINT JOHN, JAMES AUGUSTUS, at end.

In this second Trial—in this late "Relation of Sir Walter Ralegh's Troubles"—we have summoned many witnesses of great name to the judicial bar: let us not forget the sweet singer who welcomed, at the castle of Kilcolman, the brave admiral and fellow-poet on his return from the expedition designed to place the unfortunate Antonio on the Portuguese throne:

TO THE RIGHT NOBLE AND VALOROUS KNIGHT, SIR WALTER RALEIGH, LORD WARDEIN OF THE STANNERYES, AND LIEFTENAUNT OF CORNEWAILE.

"To thee, that art the summer's nightingale,
The soueraine goddesses most deare delight,
Why doe I send this rusticke madrigale,
That may thy tunefull eare unseason quite?
Thou onely fit this argument to write,
In whose high thoughts Pleasure had built her bowre,
And daintie Love learnd sweetly to indite.
My rimes I know unsauory and sowre,
To taste the streames, that like a golden showre
Flow from thy fruitfull head, of thy loue's praise,— Fitter perhaps to thunder martiall stowre,
When so thee list thy lofty Muse to raise:
1730

Yet till that thou thy poeme wilt make knowne,
Let thy faire Cynthia's praises be thus rudely showne."

Ralph, James, probably a native of Philadelphia, Penna., in 1724 accompanied Benjamin Franklin to London, without waiting for the company of his wife, for whose loss he seems to have consoled himself in no great time. In his new home he found it convenient to borrow the name and money (his theological speculations he had already adopted) of his philosophic friend, and essayed, without much success, to instruct the young in the school and to amuse their elders on the stage. He subsequently secured the notice of Bubb Dodington, Lord Melcombe, and became known as a warm adherent of the faction of the Prince (Frederick) of Wales, a political journalist and pamphleteer, a dramatist, a poet, and a historian. Towards the close of Sir Robert Walpole's term of power he was "bought off" from the opposition by an income, and on the accession of George III. he was rewarded by the grant of a pension, but did not live to receive more than six months' income, dying at Chiswick of a fit of the gout, Jan. 24, 1762. 1. And makes night hideous: Answer him, ye owls."

16. Use and Abuse of Parliament, 1660–1744, 1741, 2 vols. 8vo. Anon.

"England can never be undone but by a Parliament."—LORD BURLEIGH.

17. Hist. of England during the Reigns of King William, Queen Anne, and King George I., with an Introductory Review of the Reigns of the Royal Brothers Charles II. and James II., in which are to be found the Seeds of the Revolution, by a Lover of Truth and Liberty, 2 vols. fol.: i., 1744; ii., 1746; l. p., Cutlar Fergusson, 1860, £3 4*s*. This History, a work of great merit for facts, was exhumed after Mr. Fox's eulogy, but it soon again fell into neglect, and has never reached a second edition. It goes by the name of a "Tory history," but has been highly praised by Whig critics:

"An historian of great acuteness as well as diligence, but who falls sometimes into the common error of judging too much from the event."—C. J. FOX: Hist. of the Early Part of the Reign of James II., 1808, 4to.

"I have found the place in Ralph, and a great deal more important matter relative to the transactions of those times, which is but slightly touched by other historians. I am every day more and more surprised that Ralph should have had so much less reputation as an historian than he seems to deserve."—C. J. Fox, in a letter to Laing.

"But the great historian for detail, even more than Tindal, is Ralph, . . . ill-humoured, no doubt, but laborious and impartial. Indeed, the whole work should be looked over, though it cannot, and for general purposes it need not, be regularly read."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XXII. See, also, Lect. XIX.

"Thomas Hollis gave his copy of Ralph's History to the Library of Harvard Library, where it attracts attention from a MS. note by the donor, dated Mar. 3, 1770." (Vide No. 15, supra.)

Of the History he remarks,

"The author of it was the late ingenious, indigent Mr. James Ralph, a lover of liberty at all times, and for the most part an asserter of it."

"The bigoted historian."—LORD CAMPBELL: Lives of the C. Justices: C. J. Holt, vol. ii.

"We have not met with a poorer book of its kind than this for a very long time. . . . Their authorities are of the very commonest kind, their reading is of the very loosest character, and their conception of the requirements of their subjects is little less than absurd. The book is bad enough in all conscience for one man to have done; but it becomes a marvel of short-coming as the sum of the powers of two. . . . In no one of all the thirteen lives affected to be treated in this volume has there been given a single atom of new information."—Lon. Athen., 1853, 936, 964.

"Whatever assent may be given to the critical remarks and judicial opinions of the biographers, they will receive general praise for the industry and talent displayed in the work. The idea of writing the lives of the laureates was a happy one, and it has been executed well."—Lon. Lit. Gaz., Aug. 6, 1853, 759.

Ramsay, Mrs., an Englishwoman, after fifteen years spent in the study of Dante's great poem, amidst the scenes in which he lived and wrote, gave to the world: Dante's Divina Commedia; Translated into English, in the Metre and Triple Rhyme of the Original; with Notes, (Inferno, Purgatorio, and Paradiso,) Lon., 1863, 2 vols. p. 8vo.

Ramsay, Allan, 1685–1758, a native of Leadhills, Lanarkshire, Scotland, in 1701 removed to Edinburgh, and, after some experience as a wig-maker, engaged in the more congenial occupation of bookselling, (he was the founder of Circulating Libraries in Scotland,) which he made conducive to profit as well as pleasure. About 1736 he lost money by the erection of a play-house in Carruber's Close, (shut up—if ever opened—by the act of 1737;) but he subsequently laid by enough (afterwards scattered) to justify his retiring from business and seeking rest in a house built by himself on the north side of Castle Hill, styled by the poet Ramsay Lodge, but, from its small size and peculiar shape, compared by the wags to "a goose pie,"—of which piece of facetiousness the occupant complained to his noble friend Lord Elibank. The reply was not consolatory:

"What!" exclaimed his lordship; "a goose pie? In good faith, Allan, now that I see you in it, I think the house is not ill named."

About a hundred years after the date of this speech, another nobleman (Lord Murray) determined to honour the memory of the author of The Gentle Shepherd with a marble monument; and we presume that ere long (and for a long season) the visitor to Edinburgh will be pleased with the opportunity of paying at the same time a tribute to the gratitude of the living and the genius of the dead. Ramsay's publications in book form are the following:

1. Christ's Kirk on the Green, Edin., 1716, (see James I., King of Scotland.) From an old MS., with an additional canto by Ramsay. 2d ed., 1718, 12mo. Containing a second original canto by Ramsay. 5 edits. were pub. in the four following years. From one of Ramsay's cantos Wilkie took his picture of the Husband and Wife. 2. Tartana; or, The Plaid, 8vo. 3. Scots Songs, 1718, 8vo. 4. Elegies on Maggy Johnson, John Cowper, and Lucky Wood, 1718, 8vo. These and other early effusions of Ramsay—The Scribblers Lashed, The City of Edinburgh, Address, Salutation, Familiar Epistles, &c.—were originally issued in separate sheets. 5. Fables and Tales, 1722, 1 vol. 6. The Fair Assembly; a Poem, 1723. 7. Health; a Poem, 1724. 8. The Tea-Table Miscellany, (Songs, English and Scottish,) 1724, &c., 4 vols. 12 edits. in a few years. Musick for the Collection was pub. separately in 6 Parts, by Ramsay, in 1725. He refitted about sixty of the old airs with new verses, partly by himself and partly by others,—Hamilton of Bangour, Robert Crawford, and Mallet. Ruddiman assisted in the Glossary. See Scott's Introductory Remarks, &c., ut infra; Lockhart's Life of Scott, chap. ii.; Blackw. Mag., xlv. 6. 9. The Evergrene; being a Collection of Scots Poems wrote by the Ingenious before 1600, 1724, 2 vols. 12mo; new ed., 1761, 2 vols. sm. 8vo. He introduced into this collection (not well edited) two pieces of his own,—The Vision and The Eagle and Robin-Redbreast.

"But the first editor who seems to have made a determined effort to preserve our ancient popular poetry was the well-known Allan Ramsay, in his Evergreen, containing chiefly extracts from the ancient Scottish Makers, whose poems have been preserved in the Bannatyne Manuscript, but exhibiting amongst them some popular ballads."—Sir Walter Scott: Introductory Remarks on Popular Poetry (q. v.) prefixed to Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border. See, also, Blackw. Mag., xxxvii. 288.

10. The Gentle Shepherd; a Scots Pastoral Comedy, 1725. Patie and Roger had already been pub. in the author's vol. of Poems, 1720, 12mo, and Jenny and Maggy in the ed. of his Poems, 1721, 4to. These reappeared in The Gentle Shepherd. There have been many edits. of this, the best-known of Ramsay's productions. We notice the following: I. With a Glossary and plates by David Allan, Glasgow, by Foulis, 1788, 4to. II. With Illustrations of the Scenery, Memoirs of David Allan, Life of Ramsay, Glossary, &c., Edin., 1808, 2 vols. 8vo.; l. p., r. 8vo. III. With Select Poems, People's ed., new ed., Lon., 1850, r. 8vo. IV. With Life, Lon., 1851, 18mo. V. With Life, Criticisms, Glossary, and Cat. of Scottish Poets, N. York, W. Gowans, 1852, 12mo. It was trans into English by Cornelius Vanderstop, Lon., 1777, 8vo, by William Ward, 1785, 8vo; by Margaret Turner, 1790, 8vo. Pope and Gay (a lounger in Ramsay's book-store when in Edinburgh with the Duke and Duchess of Queensberry) were among the warmest admirers of the Scots Pastoral Comedy. Ramsay's name is often mentioned in connection with that of Burns; and by one of our modern critics The Gentle Shepherd is thus introduced in comparison with the effusions of the later poet:

"Ramsay had not the force of Burns; but neither, in just proportion to his merits, is he likely to be felt by an English reader.

The fire of Burns's wit and passion glows through an obscure dialect l y its confinement to short and concentrated bursts. The interest which Ramsay excites is spread over a long poem, delineating manners more than passions; and the mind must be at home both in the language and manners to appreciate the skill and comic archness with which he has heightened the display of rustic character without giving it vulgarity, and refined the view of peasant life by situations of sweetness and tenderness without departing in the least degree from its simplicity. . . . Like the poetry of Tasso and Ariosto, that of 'The Gentle Shepherd' is engraven on the memory of its native country. Its verses have passed into proverbs; and it continues to be the delight and solace of the peasantry whom it describes."—Campbell's Specimens: Ramsay. See, also, his comments on Spenser.

"Exhibited rusticity without vulgarity, and elegant sentiment without affectation."—ROSCOE: Lorenzo de' Medici, vol. i.

"I must not omit the mention of another pastoral drama, which will bear being brought into comparison with any composition of this kind, in any language; that is, Allan Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd. . . . But, though subject to these local disadvantages, which confine its reputation within narrow limits, it is full of so much natural description and tender sentiment as could do honour to any poet. The characters are well drawn, the incidents affecting, the scenery and manners lively and just."—Blair's Lects. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, Lect. XXIX.: Pastoral Poetry.

"Theocritus was a pleasant Pastoral, and Sicilia sees him among the stars. But all his dear Idyls together are not equal in worth to the single Gentle Shepherd."—JOHN WILSON: Blackw. Mag., June, 1832, 985; repub. in the Recreations of Christopher North.

See, also, Blackw. Mag., vii. 33, xvii. 373, xlv. 645; J. Foster's Life and Corresp., ed. 1855, i. 171.

Boswell thought it so creditable to his country's genius that he offered to initiate his great preceptor into its beauties; but the prejudices of the Anti-Scotist were unconquerable:

"I spoke of Allan Ramsay's 'Gentle Shepherd,' in the Scottish Dialect, as the best pastoral that had ever been written; not only abounding with beautiful rural imagery and just and pleasing sentiments, but being a real picture of manners; and I offered to teach Dr. Johnson to understand it. 'No, sir,' said he; 'I won't learn it. You shall retain your superiority by my not knowing it.'"—Boswell's Johnson, by Croker, ed. 1848, r. 8vo, 252.

At the sale of Lord Murray's library in Edinburgh, in 1862, a MS. copy of The Gentle Shepherd, and other MS. poems and songs, never published, were sold to William Chambers for 31 guineas.

After a number of reprints, a very superior ed., corrected and enlarged, with a Life, (by George Chalmers,) and Remarks on his Poems, (by Lord Woodhouselee,) was pub., Lon., 1800, 2 vols. 8vo: again, 1808, 2 vols. r. 8vo; new ed., Edin., 2 vols. 8vo; i., 1827; ii., 1829. The last eds., with Life by Chalmers, are: Lon., 1848, 3 vols. imp. 18mo; 1851, 3 vols. 12mo; 1852, 3 vols. 12mo. Earlier modern eds. were pub. in 12mo and 18mo; and Select Poems, with Gentle Shepherd, new ed., 1850, r. 8vo. Ramsay, Allan, Jr., 1713–1784, son of the preceding, and father of Major-General John Ramsay, of the Royal Army, of the wife of Sir Archibald Campbell, and of Mrs. Colonel Malcolm, was portrait-painter to, and a great favourite of, George III. "The son of the poet was a man of literature as well as genius. The following whimsical specimen of his poetry [a burlesque on Horace's Integer Vitæ, from Edin. Ann. Reg., 1813] is subjoined as a curiosity."—Campbell's Specimens.

"Even in his portraits he shows that just, steady spirit which he so agreeably displays in his conversation."—Bouquet's Present State of the Fine Arts in England, 1755.

We have seen that Dr. Johnson would have none of the elder Ramsay's poetry: he was not so abstemious as regarded the son's dinners:

"Well, sir, Ramsay gave us a splendid dinner. I love Ramsay. You will not find a man in whose conversation there is more instruction, more information, and more elegance, than in Ramsay's."—Johnson to Boswell: Life, ed. 1848, r. 8vo, 610.

Ramsay, Andrew Michael, LL.D., better known as the Chevalier de Ramsay, 1686–1743, a native of Ayr, Scotland, educated at the University of Edinburgh, LL.D., Oxford, 1730, became a convert to the religious and philosophical opinions of his excellent host, Archbishop Fenelon, and by his influence was appointed preceptor to the Prince de Turenne and the Duc de Château-Thierry. Whilst thus engaged, he was made a knight of the order of St. Lazarus, and subsequently was for one year tutor to the two sons of the Pretender, Charles Edward and Henry, (afterwards Cardinal de York,) at Rome. Revisiting Britain, he was received into the family of the Duke of Argyle, where he prepared for the press and superintended the publication of several of his works. He subsequently returned to France, and resided in the family of the Prince de Turenne, Duc de Bouillon, in the situation of intendant, until his death, which occurred at St.-Germain-en-Laye in his 57th year. His works are now almost forgotten, even by students of the French language, which Ramsay wrote with great purity. 1. Discours sur le Poème épique; originally forming the preface of Telemachus, (Fenelon's family's) ed. 1717, 2 vols. 12mo, and also prefixed to later eds. 2. He was for many years a member of the Legislature of South Carolina, and in 1782, '83, '84, and '85 served in the national Congress, of which he was for one year President. His death was occasioned by a pistol-wound received in the streets of Charleston, May 7, 1815, from the hands of a lunatic. He was a zealous advocate of American Independence, and of public improvements of every character, an accomplished scholar, a man of fervent piety and expansive benevolence, and distinguished for every social virtue. "With regard to Dr. Ramsay's book, it is plainly an abridgment of Mr. Marshall's, written, we presume, upon the supposition that a moderate octavo is more likely to be read than five massy quartos. In other respects it bears all the lineaments of its bulky progenitor. It is quite as well written, and contains all the private history that is to be found in the other, but without the addition of one original sketch or anecdote. . . . In these volumes [Marshall's and Ramsay's] we have found a great many words and phrases which English criticism refuses to acknowledge."—Edin. Rev., Oct. 1808, 151, 170: Lives of Washington.

"He had, moreover, a more cultivated historical sense than Marshall, and used language more effectively. . . . But his narrative, though clear, wants colour. It has movement without vivacity; distinctness without graphic power. He tells the story, but fails to paint the scenes or the men. And thus, with a kind of knowledge which none but a contemporary can possess, with ample materials to draw from, and abundant means of verifying every statement by direct conference with actors still in the full possession of their faculties, he has left us a meagre volume, which must always be consulted, though it will seldom be read."—GEORGE W. Of No. 15, supra, vol. i. gives us the Colonial History; vol. ii. contains substantially the same matter, with additions and improvements in arrangement, as will be found in the author's History of the American Revolution, (No. 3, supra;) of vol. iii., nine chapters were written by Dr. Ramsay. The three vols. were reviewed by a most competent critic, Abiel Holmes, D.D., in the North American Review, March, 1818, 331–344. Dr. Holmes, after an exhibition of the faults and merits of the work, concludes with the remark,

"We believe no time can be predicted when the volumes before us will not be viewed as an ornament to our libraries and an honour to our country."—344.

"A monument of his unwearied and zealous research and patient labour for the good of the public and the honour of his country."—H. T. TUCKERMAN: Sketch of Amer. Lit., 1852.

We must not omit to call the attention of the reader to the well-written Memoir of Dr. Ramsay prefixed to vol. i. This Memoir was originally pub. in the Analectic Magazine, vol. vi. 204, (1815,) and again appeared, with alterations, in the National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans, vol. iii. of ed. of 1836, and vol. ii. of ed. of 1852.

16. Universal History Americanized; or, An Historical View of the World from the Earliest Records to the Nineteenth Century; with a Particular Reference to the State of Society, Literature, Religion, and Form of Government of the United States of America, 1819, 12 vols. 8vo. Vols. i.–iii., first pub. 1816–17, have been already noticed: see No. 15. Ramsay's biographer calls this "his last and greatest work:"

"With a view of reducing all valuable historical facts within a small compass, to form a digest for the use of those whose leisure would not admit of more extensive reading, this great work was undertaken."

To these volumes, first suggested in 1768 by a desire to abridge the Universal History, 65 vols., (see BOWER, ARCHIBALD, p. 227, supra,) Ramsay devoted many of his leisure hours for the space of forty years. The prospectus of the work ($3 per vol., in boards) will be found in the North American Review, Sept. 1815, 443–445: a notice of the first three volumes has been cited under No. 15. The remaining nine volumes seem to have failed to attract notice of any sort: they fell dead from the press: and who can marvel who puzzles his brains over the thrice-absurd title of the work?

Ramsay commenced life under the brightest auspices:

"It is saying but little of him," remarks no less a judge than Dr. Rush, "to tell you that he is far superior to any person we ever graduated at our college: his abilities are not only good, but great; his talents and knowledge universal. I never saw so much strength of memory and imagination united to so fine a judgment. . . . He writes, talks, and—what is more—lives well. I can promise more for him in every thing than I could for myself."—Letter to Charleston, Sept. 15, 1773.

We have seen that the record was preserved unblemished. As regards his literary capacity, we may appropriately quote a few lines from the pages of his biographer, already referred to:

"The great merit of Dr. Ramsay as a writer is now generally acknowledged. We are sure that we but imbody the opinion of literary men in this country when we say that, as an historian, Ramsay is faithful, judicious, and impartial; that his style is classical and chaste; and, if occasionally tinctured by originality of idea or singularity of expression, it is perfectly free from affected obscurity or laboured ornament. Its energy of thought is tempered by its simplicity and beauty of style."

It is the verdict of Dr. Holmes, (N. Amer. Rev., March, 1818, 345,)

"The style of Dr. Ramsay is justly characterized [ut supra] in the Memoir of his Life."

"This life of Mr. Jefferson is, in every sense, an authorized work. It was undertaken under the approbation of his family, with an unreserved access to the use of all the private papers of Mr. Jefferson in their possession, and has received the benefit of their recollections and opinions at every step. The purely original matter comprises about one-third of the work."—Publisher's Advertisement.

Appended to this advertisement we find favourable opinions of the work from nearly ninety authorities, principally daily newspapers. On the other hand, very grave faults are charged upon the biographer by those who willingly admit that they have derived pleasure and profit from his voluminous record.

"The American public are under very great obligations to Dr. Randall for this work, and at the same time have strong reasons to find fault with the mode of its execution. . . . While Dr. Randall's work has many of the merits of autobiography, it has more than its usual one-sidedness and exaggeration. It wholly lacks the judicial character of history. . . . Dr. Randall's style is perspicuous, but not graceful; it ministers more to the unburdening of the author's than to the delectation of the reader's mind, and sins not unfrequently against the canons of grammar and of rhetoric."—A. P. Peabody, D.D.: N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1858, 562, 563.

Randolph, John, 1773–1833, a native of Prince George county, Virginia, descended in the seventh degree from Pocahontas, educated at Princeton, Columbia, and William and Mary Colleges, was a member of the national House of Representatives from 1799 to 1829, with the exception of three intervals of two years each. Declining a re-election in 1829, he was soon afterwards chosen a member of the Convention for the revision of the Constitution of Virginia; was minister to Russia from August, 1830, to October, 1831; and died at Philadelphia when on the point of embarking for Europe for the benefit of his health. A number of his political speeches were pub. separately from time to time; a Selection from his Speeches will be found in his biography by Lemuel Sawyer, N. York, 1844, 8vo; and in 1834 appeared Letters of John Randolph to a Young Relative, Phila., 8vo, pp. 254. Notices of his personal peculiarities, and of his impassioned, eloquent, and ready, often sarcastic, wit, will be found in several of the authorities annexed: Hugh A. Garland's Life of J. "The speech of Mr. Randolph [Non-Importation of British Merchandise, 1806] is certainly the production of a vigorous mind. It abounds in plain and striking statements, united with imagery by no means destitute of merit, though directed by an exceedingly coarse and vulgar taste."—Lord Brougham: Edin. Rev., Oct. 1807, 2.

See Stephen, James, M.P., No. 2.

"I have read some of Randolph's speeches; but the effect must depend very much on the manner. There is a good deal of vulgar finery. Malice there is, too; but that would be excusable, provided it were in good taste."—Sir J. Mackintosh: N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1852, 447, n.

"His speeches were awfully long, often occupying three days, but exceedingly effective, particularly when he was in the sarcastic vein. . . . Amongst other oddities, he took an unaccountable interest in English topography, and could have competed with Pennant himself in a minute acquaintance with our country-seats and villages, though we are not aware that he ever paid a visit of any duration to this country."—A. Hayward, Q.C.: Lon. Quar. Rev., Dec. 1840, 35, 36.

"He delighted his friends, scourged his enemies, and fixed the astonished curiosity of all who heard him. With the young and curious, he was the first lion they were eager to see."—Rev. Timothy Flint: Lon. Athen., 1835, 697.

Randolph, Peyton. Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Court of Appeals of Virginia, 1821–28, Richmond, 1823–32, 6 vols. 8vo.

Randolph, Sir Thomas, 1523–1590, a native of Kent, educated at Christ Church, Oxford, Principal of Broadgate Hall, 1549–53, and, under Elizabeth, ambassador to France, Russia, and Scotland. His account of his embassy in Russia, 1568, was pub. in Hakluyt's Voyages; two of his Letters were pub. by J. Oliphant in Buchanan's Letters, 1711, 8vo, (since inserted in the Edinburgh and Leyden edits. of Buchanan's Works;) some of his Letters, Instructions, and Dispatches are in Strype's Annals, Goodall's Examination of the Letters said to be written by Mary Queen of Scots, Robertson's Hist. of Scotland, &c. See Wood's Athen. Oxon.; Biog.

Brit.; Lodge's Illustrations. Some of his unpublished letters, &c. are among the Cotton and Harleian MSS.

Randolph, Thomas, 1605–1634, a native of Badby, Northamptonshire, was educated at, and Fellow of, Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1631 was admitted to an ad eundem degree at Oxford. Removing to London, he soon became a favourite with Ben Jonson, who adopted him as his "son"-in-the-Muses, (see CARTWRIGHT, WILLIAM,) and introduced him to a set of boon companions, who soon drank him into an early grave. He died at the house of William Stafford, was buried with the ancestors of his host, honoured by a marble monument erected by Sir Christopher (afterwards Lord) Hatton, and celebrated by a Latin and English inscription from the pen of Dr. Peter Hausted, who—"all things to all men"—wrote plays for the profane, sermons for the serious, and epitaphs for the dead. 1. Aristippus, or the Jovial Philosopher; a Tragedy; with The Conceited Pedler, Lon., 1630, 4to; 1631, 4to: anon.; 1635, 4to. 2. The Jealous Lovers; a Tragi-Comedy, 1632, 4to; 1634, 4to; 1640, 12mo; 1652, 12mo. 3. The Muses' Looking Glass; a Comedy, 1638, 4to; 1640, 8vo; 1652, 12mo; Oxf., 1668, 8vo; 1702, 8vo.

"As to this Play, it answers both the designs of Poetry, Profit, and Delight; and what a Student of Christ Church, Mr. Rich. West, said of it, will be found true by every Reader:

Who looks within his clearer Glass will say,
At once he writ an Ethick Tract and Play."

Langbaine's Dram. Poets, 415.

"The [dramatic] piece of highest merit is the 'Muses' Looking-Glass,' which hardly can be called a drama, though written for the stage. It contains a great number of contrasted portraits of the extremes of the virtues and vices of morality, which are worked into a slender frame-work, like that of the Rehearsal and such pieces. It is from this that all our extracts will be taken; but they are such rich and striking pieces of portraiture that they well deserve the space allotted to them."—Lon. Retrospec. Rev., vi. 1822, 74.

"His wit and humour are very conspicuous in the Puritan characters whom he supposes the spectators of his scenes in 'The Muses' Looking-Glass.' Throughout the rest of the drama (though it is, on the whole, his best performance) he unfortunately prescribed for himself too hard and confined a system of dramatic effect."—Campbell's Specimens.

4. Amyntas; or, The Impossible Dowry, 1638, 4to; 1652, 12mo.

"It possesses as few of the charms of truth and reality as that of Tasso, and is much its inferior in graceful beauty."—Lon. Retrospec. Rev., vi. 74.

5. Cornelianum Dolium Comœdia Cepidissima, Auctore T. R., Londini, 1638, 12mo. Ascribed to this author. The Prodigal Scholar also has been ascribed to him. 6. A Pleasant Comedie; entituled Hey for Honesty, down with Knavery; trans. out of Aristophanes his Plutus, by Thomas Randolph; augmented and published by F. J., 1651, 4to. Sir C. Wren performed the part of Nænias. A vol. of Randolph's Poems, Translations, and Plays was pub., Lon., 1634, 4to. This was succeeded by several edits. of his Poems, with some of his dramatic pieces added, viz.: Oxf., 1638, 4to; 1640, sm. 8vo; Lon., 1643, sm. 8vo; 1652, sm. 8vo; 1664, sm. 8vo; 1668, sm. 8vo: J. Lilly's Bibl. Anglo-Curiosa, 1869, 108, £1 11*s.* 6*d.* The last two edits., both called the 5th ed., and both containing the same pieces, (better than the preceding edits.,) are entitled Poems, with the Muses' Looking-Glass and Amyntas, whereunto is added the Jealous Lovers. Aristippus and The Conceited Pedler are also added. For other notices of Randolph, see Cibber's Lives; Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon., i. 564; Biog. Brit.; Spence's Anec.; Baker's Northamptonshire; Lon. Gent. Mag., Dec. 1822, 529; Cens. Lit.; Dibdin's Lib. Comp., i. 726; Scott's Poet. Works; Ellis's Specimens; European Mag., Jan. 1803 Phila. Mus., i. 401.

"He was accounted one of the most pregnant Wits of his Time, and was not only admired by the Wits of Cambridge, but likewise beloved and valued by the Poets and the Men of the Town in that Age."—Langbaine's Dram. Poets, 1691, 411.

"Such was his genius like the quick eyes wink,
He could write sooner than another think.
His play was fancy's flame, a lyghtning wit,
So shot, that it could sooner pierce than hit."

OWEN FELTHAM: on Randolph's Death.

"Donne is superior to Randolph, and Sir W. Davenant a better poet than Donne."—POPE: Spence's Anec., Lect. IV. See, also, Lect. I.

The critic of the Retrospective Review (ut supra) is not insensible to the merits of Randolph's poetry, but honesty obliges him to qualify his commendation with the admission that "They are not only marked by a coarseness of language and plainness of expression but too common among his contemporaries, but likewise indulge in warm and highly coloured descriptions, and dwell upon themes of an indelicate nature."—vi. 63.

Randolph, Thomas, D.D., 1701–1783, a native of Canterbury, educated at, and (in 1723) Fellow of, Corpus Christi College, Oxford; Vicar of Perham and Waltham, Kent; Rector of Saltwood, 1746, and soon afterwards elected President of Corpus Christi College; Vice-Chancellor, 1756–59; Archdeacon of Oxford, 1767; Margaret Prof. of Divinity, 1768. He pub. eleven occasional sermons and pamphlets, 1733–77, and the following works: 1. The Christian's Faith a Rational Assent, in Answer to Christianity Not Founded on Argument, (see DODWELL, HENRY,) Lon., 1744, 8vo.

A Vindication of the Worship of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; against T. Lindsey, 1775, 8vo. 5. The Prophecies and other Texts cited in the New Testament compared with the Hebrew Original and with the Septuagint Version, to which are added Notes, 1782, 4to.

"A very valuable tract."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"This valuable and beautifully printed tract is now rarely to be met with, and only to be procured at seven or eight times its original price, [2*s.* 6*d.*] The most material of this excellent critic's observations are inserted in the notes to our chapter on the Quotations from the Old Testament in the New, in the former part of this volume."—Horne's Introduc. to the C. S., &c. of the H. Scriptures, vol. ii.

After Randolph's death appeared—6. A View of our Blessed Saviour's Ministry and the Proofs of his Divine Mission arising from thence, together with a Charge, Dissertations, Serms., and Theological Lects., to which is prefixed an Account of his Life, 1784, 2 vols. 8vo. He assisted J. Chelsum in his Remarks on Mr. Gibbon's Roman History, and the historian's comments on his observations will be found in Gibbon's Miscellaneous Works, ed. 1837, 754, 755, 770, 772, 774.

Vols. i., ii., and iii. were reviewed by Henry Hallam in Edinburgh Review, April, 1805, 209–228. We quote a few lines from the conclusion:

"If we seem to have been too harsh and rigorous in our scrutiny, it should be remembered that no duty of an historian is so essential as fidelity, nor any so incumbent upon a critic as to investigate narrowly those portions which, as they are founded upon very remote and obscure authorities, few readers have the leisure or inclination to examine."—p. 228.

"It is elaborate and, in some respects, entertaining, but, both in the plan and the manner of the execution, defective."—PARKE GODWIN: Hist. of France, i., 1860, Preface.

Raspe, Rudolph Erich. The following article was prepared for us by a friend some years ago, since which time several editions of "Munchausen's Travels" have been published, especially one in quarto with ample and bold illustrations by Gustave Doré, which appeared in London about 1867, without date, but as published by Cassel, Petter & Galpin, Ludgate Hill. This brilliant edition, like its predecessors of all kinds, has no regular or sufficient account of the origin or the author of the fictions it contains; although in its preface, which is pleasant and well worth reading, the book itself is conjectured to be "a collection of curious incidents and adventures from various sources" made by "a German named Raspe." Still, the name of the so-called collector of the incidents of the work is given as somewhat doubtful, and he is regarded as deriving his materials generally from learned and rare books. In fact, his main purpose is supposed, as it had been frequently supposed before, to be that of ridiculing Bruce's Travels, whose truth was at one period often unjustly called in question, but which could not have been a matter in Raspe's mind when he was writing, since his little book was printed nearly six years before Bruce's five large volumes of travels had appeared. Of course, nearly every thing seems now as unsettled as ever about "Munchausen's Travels" and its author.

We propose, therefore, to give the principal facts concerning the life of a man who wrote one of the most popular and successful books that ever was published, as well as concerning his motives and resources for writing it; and to give them, too, as they were familiarly known to many eminent persons in Göttingen who had been much acquainted with the distinguished parties concerned, less than twenty-five years earlier than the time referred to, and who never ceased to be interested in their history and fate, or to talk about them, and especially about the strange adventures, the real learning and miserable crimes of Raspe himself, who wrote Munchausen's Travels for bread, when he was in want and disgrace.

"There have been many conjectures concerning the origin and the authorship of the stories in Baron Munchausen's Travels. Meusel, in his Lexikon, (vol. xi. p. 52, 1811,) says that Rudolph Erich Raspe 'translated into English the well-known Munchausen lies.' Southey, (Omniana, 1812, vol. i. p. 155,) from coincidences between two of the tales and two in a Portuguese periodical published about 1730, thought that the English fictions must have come from the Portuguese, or that both must be traced to some common source older than either. The Encyclopædia Americana (art. Munchausen, 1832) says they were the work of Bürger, the poet, who published them in 1787 as if translated from the English, when they were, in fact, the Baron Friederich von Munchausen's own stories, and that Bürger became involved in some difficulty in consequence. William West, in his 'Fifty Years' Recollections of an Old Bookseller,' (London, 1837, p. 18,) says that 'Bruce's Travels gave rise to "Gulliver revived, or the Travels of Baron Munchausen," written by St. John of Oxford, in a vein of irony upon poor Bruce.' Döring, in his life of Bürger, (1847, p. 366,) speaks in the text of his biography as if Bürger were the author of the Munchausen tales, but doubts it in a note, without, however, suggesting who the author may have been. Sir Charles Lyell, in his 'Principles of Geology,' (Boston, 1853, p. 42,) while praising Raspe for his treatise De Insulis nuper inventis, records him in a note as the author of Baron Munchausen's Travels. Somebody in the Gentleman's Magazine (1856, vol. i. p. 588) says they were the joint work of Raspe and Bürger. Again, Mrs. Brewster, in her Letters from Cannes and Nice, (1857, p. 137,) exclaims, 'Baron Munchausen is here,' which she explains by adding that there was a person of that name at Nice, who said that 'one of his ancestors had a chaplain who was famous for drawing a long bow, and that his patron, the Baron of those days, wrote a book outheroding Herod, being a collection of marvellous adventures, for the purpose of shaming the priest, for which laudable design he was punished by having his own name held up to posterity as the story-teller par excellence.' And finally, in the last edition of Lowndes's 'Bibliographer's Manual,' 1861, after sundry pros and cons, we are told that the authorship 'has never been settled.'

"We suppose, however, that it can be settled. In each of the conjectures and suggestions made, by Mousel and Southey and so on down to the editor of Lowndes, there may be items and hints of the truth. Traces of the Munchausen tales may perhaps be found in the 'Deliciæ Academicæ,' published at Heilbronn, in 1665, under the title of 'Mendacia Ridicula,' from which the two Portuguese stories and the two corresponding stories in Munchausen may also have been taken. But it is not safe to decide on the origin of many wild fictions that are current in the world, and, among the rest, some that are found in Munchausen's Travels. For instance, the absurd story of the cherry-stone that was shot into a stag's head and grew to be a tree, is found, with slight variations about a wild boar, in the burlesque chronicle of Francesillo de Zuñiga, the wise fool of Charles V., written about 1547, to amuse his master. But this light caricature, which might perhaps in other ways be deemed suggestive of such books as Munchausen, was never printed until 1855. (Rivadeneyra, Biblioteca, tom. xxx.) Still, some of the stories may have come from sources as obscure as the Deliciæ Academicæ or even Zuñiga. But the origin of most of them is much nearer at hand, and the facts relating to the subject are as follows:

"There lived, in the latter half of the eighteenth century, at Bodenweder, in the Electorate of Hanover, a certain Baron Friederich von Munchausen, who had been in the Russian service against the Turks, but who was then established on his own estates near the Weser, and much addicted to the chase, to good cheer, and to story-telling of the most extravagant sort. He was connected with the old family of which Baron Munchausen—who was minister to George II. for Hanover and induced that monarch to found the University of Göttingen—was the most eminent member, so that, from his respectable connexions, social qualities, and free hospitality, the Baron of Bodenweder was tolerated, if not respected, by the nobility and gentry of his neighborhood. He died in 1797.

"Among the persons who often visited him was Rudolph Erich Raspe, a man of learning, who was for some time connected with the library at Göttingen, and afterwards, in 1767, became a Professor in Cassel, and Keeper of a curious collection of antique gems and medals belonging to the Elector of Hesse. While in office there, this Raspe stole and sold gems and coins to the amount of about two thousand thalers, (nearly $1500,) and then, at a moment when, with the permission of the Elector, he was on his way to Berlin for a visit, he sent back the keys of the cabinets that had been intrusted to him, and fled. On examination, the felony was at once discovered, and advertisements were issued for the offender's arrest, describing him as a person who lived and dressed extravagantly,—habits of foolish expense having led him to the crime he had committed. He was seized at Clausthal, in the Hartz Mountains, but almost immediately escaped from the officers of justice, and made his way to England,—never again to put his foot upon the continent. This was in 1775.

"Before he left Germany, however, he had been well known as an author, and had been made a member of the Royal Philosophical Society of London, in the fifty-ninth volume of whose 'Transactions' there is a paper in Latin by him 'on the bones and teeth of elephants and other animals found in North America and various boreal regions of the world.' He had also published a treatise in Latin on the Cosmogony, in 1763; a play on the birthday of Queen Caroline of England, in 1764; and an edition of some of the inedited works of Leibnitz, in 1765. When he reached London, he therefore naturally looked to authorship for a support. He wrote on the subject of volcanoes in 1776; published in 1776 and 1777 a translation of the mineralogical travels of Ferber in Italy and Hungary; in 1781 an Essay on the Origin of Oil Painting, [see Walpole's Letters, ed. 1861, vii. 314, 347, 473, 509; viii. 38, n.,] and in 1786 an account of some parts of James Tassie's [see TASSIE, JAMES] well-known collection of casts from ancient and modern gems. [See, also, Watt's Bibl. Brit., and Nichols's Lit. Anec., vii., (Index,) 343, 660.] But he was improvident and reckless. His bad character followed him from Germany. The Royal Society struck his name from the rolls of its members; and, in revenge, he threatened to publish a travestie of their Transactions, under the title of 'Unphilosophical Transactions of the Philosophers of England;' but it never appeared,—perhaps because the booksellers would not venture the experiment. He became at last very poor. He even sunk so low as to earn his bread in a German coffee-house in London, as one of its employés. While in this humble condition and a desperate man, he remembered the stories he had heard at the hospitable table of Baron Munchausen, and, thinking he could turn them to account, he published in 1785 a small pamphlet of his recollections of them, entitled 'Baron Munchausen's Narrative of his Marvellous Travels and Campaigns in Russia,'—exaggerated and caricatured, no doubt, but generally bearing a sufficient resemblance to the stories the baron had invented for the amusement of his bottle-companions, to permit their origin to be recognized. The venture succeeded. A new edition was called for the next year, and in less than a month after this second edition appeared, he published a third, with important additions, and with engravings to make it more attractive. This, for a time, gave him a new start in life, or seemed to do so; and, being still countenanced by Tassie, the eminent artist, who had extraordinary skill in making casts of ancient gems, he published in 1791 'A Descriptive Catalogue of a General Collection of Ancient and Modern Gems,' &c., in two volumes 4to; a learned and amusing book, on which he must have been long employed, and which is still valued and brings good prices.

"But his efforts were all in vain. His character had no proper foundation, and his habits were of the worst. Having a good knowledge of mineralogy, he obtained occasional employment from persons engaged in mining, and was at one time in Cornwall. But there, too, he failed. At last he went to Ireland, hoping to be more successful in the same way; but, after a short period of miserable suffering, he died at Mucross, in the county of Kerry, where there are copper-mines, in the latter part of the year 1794, about fifty-eight years old.

"Soon after the appearance of Munchausen's Travels in England, the little book was naturally carried to Germany and became known in the kingdom of Hanover. Gottfried August Bürger, author of the famous ballad of 'Lenore,' was then living at Göttingen, almost as poor as Raspe, and quite as unprincipled. He, too, was a personal acquaintance of Munchausen's,—had enjoyed his riotous hospitality and had heard his wild stories. As a promising literary adventure, he translated the little book of Raspe, and made additions to it from the stores of his own memory, so that it was published in 1787 and 1788 in two editions, or perhaps only with a changed title-page, at Göttingen, not very far from where Munchausen lived, and where his habits and stories were perfectly well known. But this was more than the fox-hunting baron could submit to. He therefore took legal proceedings against Bürger and against the bookselling house who were his publishers, and so thoroughly alarmed them that the imprint of 'London' instead of 'Göttingen' was put on the copies that had not been sold, and subsequently, as the matter was still further pressed, the remainder of the edition was destroyed, and the suit stopped by the full submission of the offending parties. The work itself seems to have been little noticed in the German journals of the time; but in the 'Allgemeine Deutsche Bibliothek,' to which Raspe is said earlier to have been a contributor, a review of the 'Travels' begins by saying, 'This is a collection of lies long ago told by Baron M., but probably invented, in part, by the anonymous author of this miserable book.'

"The 'miserable book,' however, has since gone its way over the world triumphantly, little regarding law or truth. It has been translated into many languages; printed and reprinted in all forms; altered and enlarged; and, although generally injured by the changes it has undergone, it has never been absolutely spoiled by any of them. It would be difficult to find a dozen books of amusement in modern times, that have been so attractive to all classes of society in all civilized countries; the peculiar delight of children, and yet not neglected by the mature and the cultivated; affording materials for the gayest frolics in the arts, and happy illustrations for the wit of orators, poets, and statesmen. Once, at least, it was swelled to four volumes. But it was a mistake to make it so large. In 1856 it was published in a thin quarto of only 22 pages, double columns, at Düsseldorf, with eight capital designs by A. von Witte; probably the most agreeable edition that has yet appeared. The last triumph, however, of Baron Munchausen that we have seen, is an announcement by Trübner, some time since, that he was printing a Russian translation of his wild fictions.

"On the other hand, Raspe has rarely enjoyed the honours, whatever they may be, to which he is entitled as their author. Indeed, in 1811 he was inquired after in the Gentleman's Magazine (vol. lxxxi., ii., p. 147) as a forgotten naturalist; and though a notice of him, written by Depping, the historian, is to be found in the 'Biographie Universelle,' it is evident that Depping knew nothing of Raspe's most successful achievement. Whatever, in fact, relates to his connection with Baron Munchausen and his stories as we have here given them—to his misery in London, —to Bürger's troubles in consequence of his translation,—to the lawsuit, &c.—was obtained above half a century ago from several of the professors and other men of learning in Göttingen who had known well Munchausen, Bürger, and Raspe, and who were familiar with all the circumstances relating to the origin and publication of 'Munchausen's Travels' in England and Germany.

"There is no end to the reprints of this famous book, in all languages, but especially in German and English; many of them with rude engravings, but the greater number relying wholly on the stories themselves, which, in truth, need no additions to make them attractive. The best, perhaps, and certainly the most curious, is the third English edition, which was the amplest issued by Raspe himself. It contains the two stories about the wild animal shot by a cherry-stone, and the sounds that were frozen up and thawed out, both of which, being in Southey's Portuguese review and in the 'Mendacia Ridicula,' are perhaps due to the learning of Raspe, and not to the reckless imagination of the real Munchausen. And the same may be said, with even less question, concerning the story about the balloon that carried off the London College of Physicians while they were dining sumptuously together at their anniversary, on the 30th of September, 1785; because Montgolfier had made his first experiment only three years before Raspe published this jest, and Raspe had not then seen the Baron for nearly a dozen weary and sad years. But the stories, with this and a few other exceptions, must have come from the dinner-table at Bodenweder, for they were too well recognized when they got back there.

"The first two editions that were published as inconsiderable pamphlets, seem to have disappeared. At least, Watt, Lowndes, and the other bibliographers who are careful in their notices of 'Munchausen's Travels,' begin with the third, which, from the unexpected success of the first and second, was evidently much enlarged as quickly as possible. A copy of it, now on our table, contains about a dozen engravings from designs which show that the humour of the stories had been comprehended by the artist. The title-page is as follows:

'Gulliver Revived,
Or the singular
Travels, Campaigns, Voyages and Adventures
of Baron Munikhouson commonly called Munchausen.'

"The third edition considerably enlarged and ornamented with a number of views engraved from the original designs.

Printed for the Editor and sold by G. Keasley at No. 46 Fleet Street, 1786.'

This third edition, luckily, reprints the prefatory notices to the two editions that preceded it, and they are curious because they not only tell us all that it was intended the public should know about the stories, but because they show that Raspe felt some compunctions about throwing overboard, as a liar outright, the hospitable old soldier whose wine he had so often enjoyed, although the way he takes to save him is not a little whimsical. The First Preface, which is without date, but was printed in 1785, runs thus:

"'Baron Munikhouson, or Munchausen, of Bodenweder, near Hameln, on the Weser, belongs to the noble family of that name, which gave to the King's German dominions the late Prime Minister and several other public characters equally illustrious. He is a man of great original humour, and, having found that prejudiced minds cannot be reasoned into common sense, and that bold assertions are very apt to bully their audience out of it, he never argues with either of them, but adroitly turns the conversation upon indifferent topics, and then tells a story of his travels, campaigns, and adventures, in a manner peculiar to himself, and well calculated to shame the practise of lying, or, as it is politely called, drawing the long bow.

"'As this method has been often attended with good success, we beg leave to lay some of his stories before the public, and request those who fall into the company of notorious bouncers to exercise the same upon every proper occasion; i.e., where people seriously advance the most notorious falsehoods under an appearance of truth, by which they injure themselves and deceive others.'

"The second advertisement, dated 'London, April 20, 1786,' and speaking of the first as 'a little pamphlet,' holds the same tone about the Baron, declaring him to be 'a man of great honour;' and the third, which followed in less than a month, under date of 'May 18, 1786,' speaks of the additions to the volume as so important that 'it may fairly be considered a new work.' After all, however, in this form it is a very small book; but it has proved large enough to make its way to immortality."

Rastell, John, d. 1536, a learned London printer, educated at Oxford, married the sister of Sir Thomas More, and subsequently engaged in a controversy with John Frith, which resulted in his becoming a Protestant. Of how many of the books he printed he was editor, translator, or author, it would be difficult to decide: his name is principally known in connection with his Three Dialogues,—of which the New Boke of Purgatorye, 1530, fol., was answered by Frith,—his Apology against John Frith, The Church of John Rastell, and the following works: 1. Ravenscroft, Edward, temp. Charles II., an antagonist of Dryden, quitted his studies at the Middle Temple for dramatic composition, and pub. twelve plays, 1673–98, of which a list will be found in Biog. Dramat.

Ravenscroft, John Stark, D.D., 1772–1830, a native of Blandford, Prince George co., Virginia, was educated at William and Mary College; ordained Deacon and Priest in the Protestant Episcopal Church, 1817; Rector of St. James's Church, Mecklenburg co., Virginia, 1817–32; Bishop of the diocese of North Carolina, 1823. He pub. a number of occasional sermons, charges, &c.; and after his death these, with sixty-one sermons, selected by him, were repub. in his Works, containing his Sermons, Charges, and Controversial Tracts; to which is prefixed a Memoir of his Life, N. York, 1830, 2 vols. 8vo. The vols. were edited by Dr. (afterwards Bishop) J. M. Wainwright. See Sprague's Annals, vol. v., Episcopalian, 613, 617–625.

Long regarded as the standard of psalmody. The vol. contains a melody for each psalm, many of them (St. David's, Canterbury, Bangor, &c.) by Ravenscroft himself. The arrangements of the bases and minor parts were contributed by John Milton, the father of the poet, Tallis, Morley, and nineteen other English musicians. Abraham Milner's Psalm-Singer's Companion professes to contain the greater and more valuable part of Ravenscroft's Book of Psalmody, and adds many new tunes, with words from Dr. Watts and others. See Lon. Athen., Feb. 27, 1858, (comments on Herodotus from Blackw. Mag., Dec. 1855; N. Brit. Rev., Nov. 1857.)

"On the life of Herodotus and the historical notes and essays Mr. Rawlinson has bestowed much loving care and diligence: there is scarcely an ancient or modern writer whom he does not seem familiar with, and what light recent Oriental discovery serves to throw on the topics of the history, the editor avails himself of amply, having secured such distinguished associates and referees as Sir Henry Rawlinson and Sir Gardner Wilkinson. The result is, as far as life and notes and appendices go, the completest English edition of Herodotus yet published. . . . One book only of Herodotus is translated in this volume, 300 pages of appendices occupying more than half the remainder, and forming the most valuable portion of the work. . . . The work throughout is enriched by excellent maps and illustrations. . . . We have compared the present version with the versions of Littlebury [vide p. 1108, supra] and Beloe, [vide p. 162, supra,] and, though in general more accurate, Mr. Rawlinson's rendering is less grateful to the ear than either, and infinitely below the nerve and pathos of the first translator."—Lon. Athen., April 10, 1858, 464: notice of vol. i.

"This second volume of Herodotus is, in its form and general arrangement, no less than in the interest of its contents, a great improvement upon the first. . . . The philological and ethnological portion of the work opens out much that is no less new than attractive; and its illustration of the early Biblical period this volume is peculiarly full and suggestive. . . . The fruit of a remarkable experience abundantly appears in the work before us, which Sir Gardner Wilkinson has annotated in the observant spirit, though without the undiscerning belief, of the ancient historian."—Ibid., June 19, 1858: notice of vol. ii.

"This third volume of the English translation of Herodotus is in no way inferior to its predecessors in erudition, in geographical or philological interest, in the completeness of the notes and the value of the appendices."—Ibid., Dec. 18, 1858: notice of vol. iii.

Rawlinson, Colonel Sir Henry Creswicke, K.C.B., LL.D., M.P., brother of George Rawlinson, (supra,) b. at Chadlington, Oxfordshire, 1810; entered the E. I. Co.'s military service, 1826; served in the Bombay Presidency till 1832, when he was appointed to the Shah of Persia's army, in which he remained until 1839; political agent at Candahar, 1840–42; political resident at Baghdad, 1843; British Consul there, 1844, and Consul-General, 1851; Director of the E. I. Company and K.C.B., 1856; M.P. for Reigate, 1858. During his residence abroad he acquired great reputation by his discoveries in Assyria, (see his papers in the Journals of the Asiatic and Geographical Societies,) and since his return to England has been employed on the inscriptions found at Nineveh and Babylon, (see Norris, Edwin, Ph. D.,) and in illustrating his brother George's excellent edition of Herodotus, (ut supra.) 1. Outline of the History of Assyria, as collected from the Inscriptions discovered by A. H. Layard in the Ruins of Nineveh; Printed from the Journal of the Asiatic Society, Lon., 1852: see Layard, Austen Henry, D.C.L., M.P., p. 1070, supra. Ray, or Wray, John, Nov. 29, 1627–Jan 17, 1704–5, a native of Black-Notley, near Braintree, Essex, where his father was a blacksmith, after pursuing his studies for some time at Catherine Hall, Cambridge, removed to Trinity College, and there, in company with Isaac Barrow, attained the honour of a minor Fellowship in 1649, being chosen major Fellow when he had completed his Master's degree. In 1651 he was made Greek Lecturer of the College; in 1653, Mathematical Lecturer; in 1655, Humanity Reader; in 1660 was ordained deacon and priest, but never had a parochial cure, and in 1662 resigned his Fellowship rather than sign the Act of Uniformity, which required a subscription against the Solemn League and Covenant; from 1663 to 1666 accompanied his friend and former pupil, Francis Willughby, on a scientific expedition on the continent, the former attending to botany and the latter to zoology; in 1667 became a Fellow of the Royal Society, the Transactions of which he enriched by the results of some of his observations; in 1672 lost his friend Willughby, who bequeathed him the guardianship of his sons and £60 per annum. His latter years were spent in his native place, Black-Notley, where he resided in a house of his own building. He died in the communion of the Church of England, to which he was much attached. This learned and excellent natural philosopher was the first to lay down correct principles of classification in the vegetable and animal kingdoms and his works have been freely drawn from by later naturalists, both at home and abroad, as we shall see below. 1. 23. Methodus Plantarum circa Cantabrigiam nascentium, 1727, 8vo. 24. Select Remains of the learned John Ray; with his Life, by Wm. Derham, 1760, 8vo; 1761, 8vo. Consisting chiefly of his Itineraries. Other works.

See, also, WILLUGHBY, FRANCIS. A list of Ray's papers in Phil. Trans. will be found in Watt's Bibl. Brit.

The student of natural history must not neglect the following sources of information respecting this eminent man and his works: Derham's Life of Ray, (ut supra;) the biographical notices of him in Biog. Univ., by Cuvier and Du-Petit-Thomas; in Rees's Cyc., by Sir J. E. Smith; Pulteney's Sketches; Haller's Bibl. Bot.; Biog. Brit.; Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe; Memorials of Ray, by E. Lankester, M.D., Ray Soc. Pub., vol. ii. of 1st year, 1844, 8vo; Correspondence of Ray, edited by E. Lankester, M.D., Ray Soc. Pub., vol. ii. of 5th year, 1848, 8vo; WILKINS, JOHN, D.D., No. 5.

We have referred to the Ray Society. This title is perhaps a greater honour to the naturalist than that of the genus of plants known as the Raiana, (Plumier.) The Ray Society was established in 1844, for the purpose of giving to the world "new and carefully edited editions of rare books of established merit, unique MSS., and translations of works on Zoology and Botany, illustrated with fine engravings from the most recent discoveries." From 1844 to 1856, 28 vols. (18 8vo and 10 fol.) were issued. Sets are very rare, but occasionally can be bought at about twelve guineas. See Lon. Gent. Mag., Aug. 1851, 176; Athen., 1845, 704, 989.

Linnæus and Buffon are largely indebted to the works of Ray, and Cuvier traces the principal facts noted in Daubenton and Haüy's Dictionnaire d'Ichthyologie (in Encyc. Méthodique) to Ray's treatises on fishes. Respecting his zoological works, it is the remark of the eminent authority just quoted,

"They may be considered as the foundation of modern zoology, for naturalists are obliged to consult them every instant, for the purpose of clearing up the difficulties which they meet with in the works of Linnæus and his copyists. . . . The particular distinction of his labours consists in an arrangement more clear, more determinate, than those of any of his predecessors, and applied with more consistency and precision. His distribution of the classes of quadrupeds and birds has been followed by the English naturalists almost to our own days; and we find manifest traces of that he has adopted as to the latter class in Linnæus, in Brisson, in Buffon, and in all other ornithologists. . . . The first true systematist of the animal kingdom."—CUVIER: Biog. Univ.

"Ray," remarks a late English writer, who cites the testimony just quoted, "was the first zoologist who made use of comparative anatomy; he inserts at length every account of dissections that he could find; several had been made at Paris. He does not appear to be very anxious about describing every species; thus, in the Simian family he omits several well known. [Note.] 'Hoc genus animalium tum caudatorum tum cauda carentium species valde numerosæ sunt; non tamen multæ apud autores fide dignos descriptæ occurrunt.' He only describes those species he has found in Clusius or Marcgrave, and what he calls Parisienses, such, I presume, as he had found in the Memoirs of the Académie des Sciences. But he does not mention the Simia Innuus, or the S. Hamadryas, and several others of the most known species."—HALLAM: Lit. Hist. of Europe, iii 583–584.

It will be seen (WILLUGHBY, FRANCIS, infra) that Swainson considers that Willughby is justly entitled to much of the praise which has been lavished on Ray as the founder of systematic zoology.

As a botanist, the merits of Ray have been thus succinctly enumerated:

"In the botanical works of Ray we find the natural families of plants better defined, the difference of complete and incomplete flowers more precise, and the grand division of monocotyledons and dicotyledons fully established. He gave much precision to the characteristics of many classes, and introduced several technical terms, very useful for the perspicuity of botanical language; finally, he established many general principles of arrangement which have since been adopted. Ray's method of classification was principally by the fruit, though he admits its imperfections. 'In fact, his method,' says Pulteney, 'though he assumes the fruit as the foundation, is an elaborate attempt, for that time, to fix natural classes.'"—HALLAM: ubi sup., iii. 588.

"The greatest botanist in the memory of man."—HALLER: Bibl. Bot.

"The most accurate in observation, the most philosophical in contemplation, and the most faithful in description, amongst all the botanists of our own, or perhaps any other, time."—SIR JAMES EDWARD SMITH: Rees's Cyc.

As a writer, Ray is justly entitled to very high praise:

"Our countryman, the excellent Mr. Ray, is the only describer that conveys some precise idea in every term or word, maintaining his superiority over his followers and imitators, in spite of the advantage of fresh discoveries and modern information."—REV. GILBERT WHITE: Natural Hist. of Selborne, Letter XIV.

It is gratifying to be able to add that his character as a man admirably supported his high rank as a scholar and an author:

"His varied and useful labours have justly caused him to be regarded as the Father of Natural History in this country; and his character is, in every respect, such as we should wish to belong to the individual enjoying that high distinction. His claims to the regard of posterity are not more founded on his intellectual capacity than on his moral excellence."—Memoir of Ray, in Naturalist's Library, Entomology, vol. vii. 60.

"He found the highest wisdom to consist in the cordial reception of the revealed will of God, and in unfeigned subjection to it."—ORME: Bibl. Bib., 368.

In scientific knowledge he was far in advance of his age; but his contemporaries knew and valued his abilities and acquirements:

"The best Botanist and the most accomplish'd Naturalist of this or perhaps any age. . . . Of vast Memory, exact Judgment, universal Knowledge, and extraordinary Talents."—Philosoph Letters of Ray, &c., 1718, 8vo, pp. 151, 153, 154.

"Ray, who first supplied materials for the argument for natural religion, drawn from final causes."—FARRAR: Crit. Hist. of Free Thought, 1863, Lect. VIII., Note 49.

We cannot better conclude this, the latest sketch of Ray's life and labours, than with the words of his friend and first biographer:

"In his dealings, no man more strictly just; in his conversation, no man more humble, courteous, and affable; towards God, no man more devout; and towards the poor and distressed, no man more compassionate and charitable according to his abilities."—DR. His Reports on Naval Construction, and other professional writings, are highly esteemed.

Read, Thomas. See SEDDON, JOHN, No. 2.

Read, Thomas Buchanan, b. March 12, 1822, in Chester, Pennsylvania; removed to the city of Cincinnati at the age of fourteen, and became a pupil of Clevenger the sculptor. On the departure of this eminent artist to Europe, Read turned his attention to painting, in which art he soon acquired reputation. In 1840 he removed to Boston, where he married and resided for five years, varying devotion to his easel by the composition of poetry, (published in the Boston Courier, Graham's Magazine, and other periodicals,) some of which elicited the commendation of Mr. Longfellow. Thus encouraged, he gave to the world a number of volumes, which we shall presently notice in the order of their publication. In 1846 he removed to Philadelphia; passed a year in Florence, 1850–51; again visited Italy in 1853 and subsequent years; and since his late return to America has resided chiefly at Philadelphia and Cincinnati, practising his favourite profession with reputation and success.

1. Poems, Bost., 1847, 12mo.

"His verses show taste and feeling, with occasional gleams of fancy; and he seldom offends, even when he fails to please." —F. Bowen: N. Amer. Rev., lxiv. 428.

2. Lays and Ballads, Phila., 1848, 12mo.

"One of our truest poets is Thomas Buchanan Read. His most distinctive features are, first, tenderness, or subdued passion, and, secondly, fancy. His sin is imitativeness."—Edgar A. Poe: Marginalia: The Literati, 516. See, also, Peterson's Mag., Dec. 1848.

This volume was warmly commended by the English periodicals. The critic of the North British Review for August, 1852, (Coventry Patmore,) declared that "Tennyson himself" had "scarcely surpassed in its way the first thirteen stanzas of The Closing Scene." Other poems in the volume pleased Mr. Patmore less.

"It is pleasant to turn to a volume of poetry like Mr. Read's." —Lon. Chris. Rememb.

"The poems of Thomas Buchanan Read have the ring of sterling metal, and bear the superscription of genius. . . . It seems to us that he has much of the lyrical purity of Longfellow and the objective delineation of Bryant. If blossoms indicate fruit, if mind can stamp its individuality in printed words, America may point to another poet in her fast-filling list."—Lon. Critic, 1852, 353.

6. Poems, a New and Enlarged Edition, Phila., 1853, 8vo; 1854, 8vo, Illustrated; and without Illustrations. See Amer. Whig Rev., x. 501. 7. The New Pastoral; a Poem, 1855, 12mo; 1856, 12mo. This poem, written while the author was in Italy, consists of thirty-seven sketches of rustic and domestic life. Commended by Christian Annual, April, 1855, Graham's Mag., May, 1855, Putnam's Mag., Feb. 1856, &c. 8. The House by the Sea; a Poem, 1856, 12mo, pp. 152.

"A rich imagination and a cultivated sense of the proprieties of art distinguish this fresh claimant for public honours. . . . We may congratulate America on the advent of another poet destined to share the laurels of Longfellow and Bryant."—Lon. Athen., 1856, 680. See, also, Putnam's Mag., Feb. 1856, 216; Westm. "Les œuvres de M. Buchanan Read ont été favorablement accueillés dans son pays et en Angleterre. On trouve chez lui une sensibilité poétique et une élégance naturelle d'expression fort remarquables."—Dict. univ. des Contemp., par G. Vapereau, Paris, 1858, 1442.

"Mr. Read enjoys remarkable popularity both as a poet and a painter. He has an innate sense of beauty and the irrepressible temper of genius; a great command of language, a vivid fancy, and a musical ear."—Henry T. Tuckerman.

"A poet-painter, whose song has the vividness of picture, and whose canvas is painted with angels, fairies, and water-sprites, done to the ethereal life, because he sees them face to face in his poetic mood."—Hawthorne.

Reade, Charles, D.C.L., Barrister-at-Law, son of the late John Reade, Esq., of Ipsden House, Oxon, was b. 1814, and graduated at Magdalene College, Oxford, B.A., 1835; elected to one of the Vinerian Fellowships, 1842; called to the Bar by the Society of Lincoln's Inn, 1843. Mr. Reade has acquired a rapid reputation as a novelist, was for some time a contributor to London journals, and is co-author with Tom Taylor (q. v.) of the dramatic pieces Masks and Faces, The King's Rival, and Two Loves and a Life. 1. Peg Woffington; a Novel, Lon., 1852, p. 8vo; Bost., 1855, 16mo; new ed., Lon., 1868, p. 8vo. Founded on the play of Masks and Faces. Respecting the publication of this novel and No. 2 there was a controversy between Mr. Reade and Mr. Bentley, the publisher, which was settled by a judgment of Sir W. P. Wood. (See Lon. Lit. Gaz.) Commended by Lon. Athen., Lit. Gaz., Spectator, Weekly Review, Examiner, N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1857, (by A. P. Peabody,) &c. The Westminster Review (Oct. 1856) is less enthusiastic in its commendations than some of the periodicals just cited; and other critics found so much fault with the author that in 1859 he gave a paper to the public on the subject, which it is supposed will be followed by a new edition of the work, "supported by proofs of its prison revelations." In 1862 Mr. Reade obtained a judicial verdict against Mr. Conquest, of the Grecian Theatre, for eighty nights' performance of a dramatic version of this work. He has since dramatized it himself. Webb, 7th ed., N. York, 1867 16mo. Griffith Gaunt was originally published in The Argosy, and in The Atlantic Monthly, Dec. 1865 et seq Reviewed in Atlantic Monthly, Dec. 1866. It was consured for indecency and immorality by The Round Table. Mr. Reade responded in a Letter to the Editor of the New York Times, (see Round Table, Oct. 13, 1866, 168, 176,) in which he threatened to drag the editor "and his slanders before a jury of his countrymen." He was as good as his word; and in March, 1869, the "jury of his countrymen" "dragged" six cents damages out of the editor's pocket. Griffith Gaunt was dramatized, in five acts, by Augustine Daly, of New York, and successfully represented at the New York Theatre, in Nov. 1866. 15. With Boucicault, Dion, Foul Play, Lon., 1868, 3 vols. p. 8vo; Bost., 1868, 8vo. Dramatized with great success. A drama by Reade, founded on Tennyson's poem of Dora, was successfully produced, June 1, 1867, at the Adelphi Theatre, London. A review of Reade's writings, by Miss H. E. "Seldom has a writer made appeal to the public for poetic honours with the pertinacity and constant ill-success of Mr. John Edmund Reade. . . . In the mechanism of his art—as the above extract shows—Mr. Reade is sufficiently capable. To take him from his books, he has a cultured mind, a gentle heart, a trained intellect, right feelings: with such a combination of gifts, one who has lived long enough to publish four editions should bear with equanimity to be told that he is not a poet."—*Westm. As warmly censured by other periodicals, and especially by the Lon. Saturday Review. The critique last referred to made Mr. Charles Reade very angry, and elicited from him some pronunciamentos (see Lon. Critic, Jan. 28, 1860) which seem to have afforded no little amusement to the "reading public."

Sherburne says that he published Cosmographiæ Isagogen, and wrote a book entitled De Arte Faciendi Horologium, and another De Usu Globorum et de Statu Temporum. He collated the 1st and 3d edits. of Fabian's Chronicle, trans. Euclid, undertook the ancient description of England, (these all appear to have been unpublished,) and wrote two other works, (see his own list at the end of No. 5, supra,) of which no trace, either in print or MS., has been discovered,—The Gate of Knowledge, and The Treasure of Knowledge. We are also told that he wrote of Auricular Confession and De Negotio Eucharistiæ. Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5, supra, are written in dialogue between Master and Scholar, and in English. Mr. Redding has published other books, and some pamphlets; edited, or written from notes, The Travels of Captain Andrews in South America, and Pandurang Hari, (an Eastern Story;) edited many other books; established several periodicals, and contributed largely to magazines, &c.; is credited with a Memoir of Beckford of Fonthill; has put forth translations from the German and French, and has privately printed a Naval Gazetteer. See, also, GORTON, JOHN, No. 3. In 1863 he was awarded a pension of £70 per annum "in consideration of his labours in the field of political and other literature, extending over more than half a century." He has lived long enough to enjoy the triumph of those liberal principles for which he so long battled as one of a small minority. We trust that (though now over fourscore) he will be allowed to survive the publication of his History of the Last Two Wars between England and America: may "the child" ever be "unborn" who is to record the history of a third contest!

"The great success of the two volumes [Nos. 1 and 2, supra] . . . has induced me to publish another series still more complete."— Wm. B. Reed's Preface.

The "great success" of Mr. Reed's lectures is best proved by the figures. These show a sale, calculated to about Jan. 1, 1860, as follows:

In the United States, of Nos. 1, 2, and 3, in all, ...	12,425 vols.
In London, No. 1, 7000 copies.
" " 2, 4000 "
" " 3, 3000 "	14,000 "
Total sale, ...	26,425 vols.

We quote opinions on No. 3 from two high authorities:

"It will, we hope, have an extensive circulation: it is the kind of book we should like to see given as a prize to the best readers in national schools, and placed within the reach of all boys big enough to understand the author's meaning."—Lon. Gent. Mag., 1857, ii. 188.

"Prof. Reed is as ready to award praise as he is fearless in expressing censure. In short, as a critic, he is obedient to the canon of Favart, who says, 'le flambeau de la critique doit éclairer et non brûler.'"—Athen., 1857, ii. 1029–1030.

4. Two Lects. on the History of the American Union, [delivered in the Smithsonian Institute, Washington,] Phila., 1856, 12mo, pp. 68.

"No one can glance through the Lectures, which are oratorical in style, without acknowledging the noble ardour which inspires them, or without sympathizing in the American's appeal —almost as fervent as a prayer—in behalf of the Republic he loved, and to the service of which he devoted his generous and honourable life."—Lon. Athen., 1856, 1402.

"A generous and honourable life:"—the words are fitly and truly spoken. We also > "knew him but to love him,

> And named him but to praise!"

Reed, Isaac, 1742–1807, a native of London, after some experience at the bar, devoted himself to literary pursuits and the collection and enjoyment of a large library of rare books,—the sale of which after his death occupied thirty-nine days and produced more than £4000. He edited: The Poetical Works of Lady M. W. Montagu, 1768; The Cambridge Seatonian Prize Poems, 1773; The Repository, 1773–83, 4 vols. 8vo; again, 1790, 4 vols. 12mo; Middleton's Witch, 1778; 2d ed. of Dodsley's Old Plays, 1780, 12 vols. 8vo; Biog. Steevens, 1793, 10 vols. 8vo; again, with Reed's name, (being 5th ed. of Johnson and Steevens's Shakespeare,) 1803, 10 vols. 8vo. See Dibdin's Lib. Comp., 805–6; Bohn's Lowndes's Bibl. Man., 2261; Southey's Life, ch. x. He wrote the Biographical Notes to Pearch's Collec. of Poems, 1775, 4 vols.; Life of Dr. Dodd, 1777; Biographical Notes to a new ed. of Dodsley's Collec., 1782, 6 vols.; Life of O. Goldsmith, prefixed to vol. ii. of his Essays, 1795, 3 vols. 12mo; a Life of Dr. Farmer, in Seward's Biographiana; and many biographical and other articles in Westminster Mag., (of which he was probably editor,) 1773–80, in European Mag., (of which he was editor,) 1780–82, and Gent. Mag. He also contributed largely to Johnson's English Poets, and to various publications put forth by John Nichols and other persons. The later edits. were pub. in the same vol. with Horace Walpole's Castle of Otranto, of which The Old English Baron is, to some extent, a professed imitation.

"Have you seen 'The Old Baron,' a Gothic story, professedly written in imitation of Otranto, but reduced to reason and probability? It is so probable that any trial for murder at the Old Bailey would make a more interesting story. Mrs. Barbauld's 'Fragment' was excellent. This is a caput mortuum."—Horace Walpole to Rev. Wm. Mason, April 8, 1778: Letters, ed. 1861, vii. 51. See, also, 111, 319.

"In no part of The Old English Baron, or of any other of her works, does Miss Reeve show the possession of a rich or powerful imagination. Her dialogue is sensible, easy, and agreeable, but neither marked by high flights of fancy nor strong bursts of passion. Her apparition is an ordinary fiction, of which popular superstition used to furnish a thousand instances, when nights were long and a family assembled round a Christmas log had little better to do than to listen to such tales. . . . The Old English Baron has always produced as strong an effect as any story of the kind, although liable to the objections which we have freely stated, without meaning to impeach the talents of the amiable authoress."—SIR WALTER SCOTT: Biographical Notices of Eminent Novelists: Clara Reeve.

"The 'Recess' [by Sophia Lee] and the 'Old English Baron' are also [with The Castle of Otranto] 'dismal treatises,' but with little in them 'at which our fell of hair is like to rouse and stir as life were in it.' They are dull and prosing, without the spirit of fiction or the air of tradition to make them interesting."—Hazlitt's Lects. on the English Novelists.

"That the 'Old English Baron' was only seventy years ago esteemed by critics an excellent work of fiction, and became very popular, are facts that most forcibly declare the advance made during the last two generations in education and general intelligence."—Jeaffreson's Novels and Novelists, 1858, i. 274.

Reid, Captain Mayne, b. 1818, in the North of Ireland, where his father was a Presbyterian minister, was allured from the theological studies which were preparing him for the pulpit, by the thirst for adventure and the desire for foreign travel. In 1838 he visited the city of New Orleans, and from thence made several hunting and trading excursions among the Indians of the Red River country and those of Missouri, gaining that knowledge of scenery, manners, and characteristics which he has since used to such advantage in his Scalp-Hunters, White Chief, and some others of his romances. More than five years were spent on the prairies and in rapid tours of observation in almost all of the Western, Southern, and Northern States. Subsequently settling in Philadelphia, he contributed largely to the periodicals of that city and those of New York. On the breaking out of the Mexican war, in 1845, he obtained a commission in the army of the United States, and served with distinction "throughout the campaign." In 1849 he sailed from New York, at the head of a body of volunteers, for the purpose of aiding the Hungarians in their struggle for freedom. At Paris the party was arrested by the unwelcome intelligence of the defeat of the Hungarian army of the South, August 9, and the extinction of all hope by the surrender of Görgei at Arad, August 14. Captain Reid now settled in London, and produced with great rapidity a series of novels and juvenile works which have made him a favourite author with all ages. The artistic adjuncts which illustrate the text of his volumes have doubtless contributed to the triumphs of the author's graphic pen. List of his publications: 1. Several of Captain Reid's works have been translated into French and German, and praised by critics in those tongues. A new edition of his Works, in 15 vols. 12mo, was published by G. W. Carleton, N. York, 1868. A new daily paper, entitled The Little Times, is announced (1867) to appear in London, with Captain Mayne Reid as editor.

In Jan. 1869, New York, 8vo, Captain Reid established a monthly magazine. He has contributed to periodicals.

"Dès ses premiers ouvrages M. Mayne Reid . . . s'est acquis une grande réputation de conteur, justifiée surtout par la nouveauté, l'originalité hardie, et l'exactitude de ses récits; les mœurs étranges des pionniers de l'Ouest, la vie guerrière des tribus Indiennes, les tableaux pittoresques, les aventures, les chasses, les voyages, sont le fond naturellement intéressant des romans de l'écrivain soldat, qui le met en œuvre sans prétention, dans un style incorrect parfois, mais souvent plein de véhémence et d'images."—Dict. univ. des Contemp., par G. Chambers's Journal, Eliza Cook's Journal, the Nonconformist, The Standard, and other respectable authorities (vide supra) unite in the acknowledgment of Captain Reid's merits as a writer for boys:

"Now-a-days, in place of lecturers, the world of little folks has its race of story-tellers who are 'boys with the boys' and are none the less efficient for being cheerful. Among these the Captain is at the head of the company, and right worthily does he perform his office."—Athen., 1857, 15.

Reid, Thomas, brother of Alexander Reid, physician to Charles I., (supra,) and of the same family as the succeeding, was Greek and Latin Secretary to James I. He collected in a volume the Theses he had defended at foreign universities; and some of his Latin poems were inserted in the Deliciæ Poetarum Scotorum. See, also, Young, Patrick. Dempster speaks of him as a man of great distinction. A brother of Thomas Reid translated George Buchanan's History of Scotland into English.

Reid, Thomas, D.D., April 26, 1710–Oct. 7, 1796, a native of Strachan, Kincardineshire, Scotland, of the same family as the preceding, and the son of the Rev. Lewis Reid, at the age of twelve or thirteen became a student of Marischal College, Aberdeen, and was subsequently appointed to the librarianship, a post which he resigned in 1736. In 1737 he was presented by King's College, Aberdeen, to the living of New Machar, Aberdeenshire, where his amiable temper and faithful labours soon overcame the opposition of his people to an appointment which the law of patronage made repugnant to their feelings. At this time he had so little confidence in his powers of composition that he was in the habit of edifying his hearers with the sermons of Archbishop Tillotson and Dr. Evans.

In 1740 his loneliness was relieved by his marriage to Elizabeth, the daughter of his uncle, Dr. George Reid, a London physician, and about the same time he was led to an anxious investigation of those great problems in mental and moral philosophy which had become almost hopelessly obscured by the unhappy speculations of sophists who had too long been permitted to "darken counsel by words without knowledge."

His first publication, inserted in the Philosophical Transactions in 1748, and since frequently printed with other works of his, was an Essay on Quantity, occasioned by reading a Treatise in which Simple and Compound Ratios are applied to Virtue and Vice. In this paper he combats the application of mathematics to morals, contended for by Francis Hutcheson in his Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue.

In 1752 he was elected Professor of Moral Philosophy in King's College, Aberdeen, in 1763 pub. his Inquiry into the Human Mind, on the Principles of Common Sense, (London, 8vo,) and in the same year was called to the chair of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, vacated by the resignation of Adam Smith. This important office he filled with great reputation until his seventy-first year, retiring in 1781 to the undisturbed enjoyment of the society of his books, the domestic circle, and his literary friends.

In 1773 he pub., as an Appendix to the third vol. of Lord Kames's Sketches of the History of Man, An Analysis of Aristotle's Logic, (since frequently reprinted with other works of Reid's;) contributed to the Philosophical Society of Glasgow An Examination of Priestley's Opinions concerning Matter and Mind, Observations on the Utopia of Sir Thomas More, Physiological Reflections on Muscular Motion, and other papers; pub. in 1785, Edinburgh, 4to, Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man; and in 1788, 4to, Essays on the Active Powers of Man. The last two were republished together, Dublin, 1790, 3 vols. 8vo. After his retirement, he was greatly affected by the loss of his wife, after a union of fifty-two years. In the summer of 1796 he spent a few weeks at Edinburgh, in the company of his friend, former pupil, biographer, and most distinguished scholar, Dugald Stewart; on his return to Glasgow, in September, he was prostrated by sickness, and died on the 7th of October following, after repeated strokes of palsy.

His personal character was well calculated to gain the respect and affection of his acquaintances:

"Its most prominent features were intrepid and inflexible rectitude; a pure and devoted attachment to truth; and an entire command (acquired by the unwearied exertions of a long life) over all his passions."—Dugald Stewart: Memoir of Reid, Edin., 1803, 8vo, prefixed to the collective edit. of Reid's Works, Edin., 1803, 4 vols. 8vo, (N. York, 1822, 3 vols. 8vo,) and to Hamilton's Reid, (infra.) See Stewart, Dugald, Nos. 4, 5.

This edit. was reviewed by Lord Jeffrey (not by Dr. John Brown) in Edinburgh Review, Jan. 1804, 269–287: partially reprinted in Jeffrey's Contrib. to Edin. Rev., Lon., 1853, 623–630: see also 641, 642.

Stewart's Memoir, (see also his Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., 66, n., 167, n., 218–220,) which was last pub. in Sir Wm. Hamilton's collective ed. of Stewart's Works, vol. x., 1858, has been commended in the highest terms:

"The life of Dr. Reid by his disciple and friend, Mr. Dugald Stewart, the great ornament of his master's school, is known to all the world as one of the finest specimens of philosophical biography that any language can furnish."—Life of Reid, in Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., xix. 107.

"The name and writings of Dr. Reid are celebrated throughout Europe, and it would be impertinent to attempt any addition to what has been said of him in the account of his life, which is a model for the biography of a philosopher."—Sir James Mackintosh: Life, chap. i.

Reid's Inquiry into the Human Mind has frequently been published separately: Lon., 1763, 8vo; 1769, 8vo; 4th ed., 1785, 8vo; 5th ed., Edin., 1801, 8vo; 6th ed., i., Glasg., 1804, 8vo; 1817, 8vo; Edin., 1818, 8vo; 1819, 8vo; 1821, 8vo; Lon., 1853, 8vo; and, with other works of the author, it has already claimed our notice on a preceding page: see Priestley, Joseph, LL.D., No. 15, and authorities there cited.

"Dr. Reid's Inquiry into the Human Mind was the first direct attack which appeared in Scotland upon the sceptical conclusions of Mr. Hume's philosophy. For my own opinion of this work I must refer to one of my former publications, [Memoir of Reid, ut supra.] It is enough to remark here that its great object is to refute the Ideal Theory, which was then in complete possession of the schools, and upon which Dr. Reid conceived that the whole of Berkeley's reasonings against the existence of matter was founded. . . . On the refutation of the ideal theory, contained in this and his other works, Dr. Reid was disposed to rest his chief merit as an author."—Dugald Stewart: First Prelim. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit., 218.

"He [Dugald Stewart] embraced the philosophy of Dr. Reid, a patient, modest, and deep thinker, who in his first work (En quiry into the Human Mind) deserves a commendation more descriptive of a philosopher than that bestowed by Professor Cousin, of having made a vigorous protest against scepticism on behalf of common sense. His observations on suggestion, on natural signs, on the connection between what he calls sensation and conception, though perhaps occasioned by Berkeley, whose idealism Reid had once adopted, are marked by the genuine spirit of original observation."—Sir James Mackintosh: Second Prelim. Dissert to Encyc. Brit., 387: republished in his Miscell. Works, ed. 1854, i. 216.

"The most original and important of all his writings, and the groundwork of all the rest."—Edin. Rev., lvi. 220.

Hume himself was not insensible to the merit of his formidable adversary, and was candid enough to commend his treatment of the subject:

"It is certainly very rare," he writes to Reid, "that a piece so deeply philosophical is wrote with so much spirit, and affords so much entertainment to the reader. . . . I must do you the justice to own, that, when I entered into your ideas, no man appears to express himself with greater perspicuity than you do; a talent which, above all others, is requisite in that species of literature which you have cultivated." Vide Stewart's Memoir of Dr. Reid.

Of the editions of the Intellectual Powers as pub. separately, we notice: London, 1827, 8vo; edited by Rev. G. N. Wright, 1843, 8vo; by Rev. J. Walker, Camb., Mass., 1850, &c., 12mo, (see Hamilton, Sir William, p. 777, supra;) Edin., 1853, cr. 8vo; by Sir Wm. Hamilton, 1854, 8vo; Lon., 1865, cr. 8vo.

Of the Active Powers separately, we notice the ed. of Rev. G. N. Wright, with the Essay on Quantity, Memoir, and Notes, Lon., 1843, 8vo. The Essays on the Intellectual Powers and Essays on the Active Powers, with the Essay on Quantity and the Analysis of Aristotle's Logic, with Stewart's Account of Reid, were pub. together, under the title of Essays on the Powers of the Human Mind, Edin., 1803, 3 vols. 8vo; 1808, 3 vols. 8vo; 1812, 3 vols. 8vo; 1813, 3 vols. 8vo; 1819, 3 vols. 8vo; 1820, 3 vols. 12mo; 1822, 3 vols. 18mo; with Notes by G. N. Wright, Lon., 1843, 2 vols. 8vo. Of tomes ii.–vi., (Paris, 1828–9,) Œuvres complètes de Thomas Reid, Chef de l'Ecole écossaise, publiées par M. Th. Jouffry, avec des Fragments de M. Royer-Collard, et une Introduction de l'Editeur, a review, by Sir William Hamilton, was pub. in Edinburgh Review, Oct. 1830, 158–207: Philosophy of Perception, Reid and Brown; repub. in Hamilton's Discussion on Philosophy and Literature. But it is to Sir William himself, as already stated, that we are indebted for the best-known collection of Reid's Works. The volume referred to at p. 777, Edin., 1847, 8vo, 5th ed., 1858, 8vo, ended abruptly at p. 914. The remaining pages, with a general Preface, Indexes, and titles for binding in two volumes, were promised by the editor, but not supplied by him. The editors of Sir William's Lectures on Metaphysics and Logic—Messrs. Mansel and Veitch—tell us that Sir William's Lectures on Metaphysics, as edited by them,

"never were revised by him with any view to publication, and this chiefly for the reason that he intended to make use of various portions of them which had not been incorporated in his other writings, in the promised Supplementary Dissertations to Reid's Works,—a design which his failing health did not permit him to complete."—Preface to Sir W. Hamilton's Lects. on Metaphysics, Bost., 1859, vii.–viii. See, also, ix., x.; Hamilton's Discussions on Philos. and Lit.

But we can now commend to the reader: The Works of Thomas Reid, D.D., now Fully Collected, with Selections from his Unpublished Letters, Preface, Notes, and Supplementary Dissertations, by Sir William Hamilton, Bart.; Prefixed, Stewart's Account of the Life and Writings of Reid, Sixth Edition, Edin., 1863, 2 vols. 8vo, pp. xxiii., 1034, 30*s*. Supplementary Part, to complete former Editions, 1863, 8vo, 5*s*.

From the many learned opinions before us of the peculiarities and merits of Reid's philosophical tenets, our quotations must needs be few in number and brief in extent.

First let us hear Reid's own estimate—a very humble one—of his services to philosophy:

"The merit of what you are pleased to call my Philosophy lies, I think, chiefly in having called in question the common theory of ideas or images of things in the mind being the only objects of thought; a theory founded on natural prejudices, and so universally received as to be interwoven with the structure of language. Yet were I to give you a detail of what led me to call in question this theory, after I had long held it as self-evident and unquestionable, you would think, as I do, that there was much of chance in the matter. The discovery was the birth of time, not of genius; and Berkeley and Hume did more to bring it to light than the man that hit upon it. I think there is hardly any thing that can be called mine in the philosophy of the mind, which does not follow with ease from the detection of this prejudice."—Letter to Dr. James Gregory: Reid's Works, Hamilton's ed., 88.

We continue our quotations:

"The author of an Inquiry into the Mind, and of subsequen Essays on the Intellectual and Active Powers of Man, has great merit in the effect to which he has pursued this history. But, considering the point at which the science stood when he began his inquiries, he has perhaps no less merit in having removed the mist of hypothesis and metaphor with which the subject was enveloped, and in having taught us to state the facts of which we are conscious, not in figurative language, but in the terms which are proper to the subject. In this it will be our advantage to follow him; the more that, in former theories, so much attention had been paid to the introduction of ideas or images as the elements of knowledge, that the belief of any external existence or prototype has been left to be inferred from the mere idea or image; and this inference, indeed, is so little founded, that many who have come to examine its evidence have thought themselves warranted to deny it altogether. And hence the criticism of ingenious men, who, not seeing a proper access of knowledge through the medium of ideas, without considering whether the road they had been directed to take was the true or a false one, denied the possibility of arriving at the end."—Dr. Adam Ferguson: Prin. of Moral and Political Science, vol. i.

"Who carried the torch of severe and sagacious inquiry into the recesses of the human mind, and weaned men from the endless maze of metaphysical scepticism? Dr. Reid."—Sir Archibald Alison: Essays, 1850, ii. 425. See, also, his History of Europe, 1789–1815, chap. lx.

This estimate will hardly be admitted without controversy. An eminent critic, already cited, remarks of Pascal,

"His philosophical glances are wonderful. The summary of arguments for scepticism and dogmatism, especially the latter, is perhaps the best in ancient or modern philosophy. The last contains, in a single page, the whole system of Dr. Reid; and it is but little to add that it contains in the first sentence (L'unique fort des Dogmatistes c'est qu'en parlant de bonne foi, on ne peut douter des principes naturels) the whole book of Dr. Beattie."—Sir J. Mackintosh: Journal, 1808; Life, vol. i., chap. viii.

See, also, Prof. Ogilvie's letter to Mackintosh, in this chapter.

"Dr. Reid's great achievement was, undoubtedly, the subversion of the Ideal system, or the confutation of that hypothesis which represents the immediate objects of the mind in perception as certain images or pictures of external objects conveyed by the senses to the sensorium. This part of his task it is now generally admitted that he has performed with exemplary diligence and complete success; but we are by no means so entirely satisfied with the uses he has attempted to make of his victory."—Lord Jeffrey: Stewart's Life of Reid, Edin. Rev., Jan. 1804, 281: repub. in his Contrib. to Edin. Rev., ed. 1853, 628. See, also, 641, 642.

"The great aim of Reid's philosophy, then, was to investigate the true theory of perception; to controvert the representationalist hypothesis, as held in one sense or another by almost all preceding philosophers; and to stay the progress which scepticism, aided by this hypothesis, was so rapidly making. . . . That Reid has done much for the advancement of mental science, is almost universally admitted: to complain that he did not accomplish more, or follow out the track which he opened to its furthest results, is perhaps unreasonable; since we ought rather to look for the completion of his labours from the hands of his followers, than demand from himself at once the foundation and the superstructure."—Morell's Hist. of Mod. Philos., 2d ed., Lon., 1847, i. 281–295. See, also, 65, 128–132; ii. 3–5, 50, 69.

"Thomas Reid, a sincere inquirer after truth, who maintained the existence of certain principles of knowledge, independent of experience, and treated moral philosophy as the science of the human mind, allowing it, however, no other foundation than that of Common Sense, or a species of Intellectual Instinct."—Tennemann's Manual of the Hist. of Philos., trans. by Johnson Oxf., 1832, 382.

Let us refer to a few other foreign authorities.

"You can read in the translation of one of the best pupils of the Normal School, now my colleague in this faculty, the judicious Reid, with the truly superior commentary of M. Royer-Collard. The Scotch philosophy will prepare you for the German philosophy. It is to Reid and to Kant that I refer in great part the polemics which I have instituted against empiricism in the person of Locke."—M. Victor Cousin: Course of the Hist. of Mod. Philos., trans. by O. W. Wight, N. York, 1854, ii. 433, and 244; i. 314, 341.

See, also, Cousin's Leçons, vii. and viii., and then compare with them Dr. Chalmers's arguments in N. Brit. Rev., Feb. 1847.

"Dr. Reid has not even attained the solitary end of refutation; for all the conclusions of his countrymen, Berkeley and Hume, as to the non-existence of matter and spirit, can be argued as well from his more ideal system as from Locke's ideal.—from Reid's impressions as from Locke's ideas. Nay, more—Reid leaves the existence of external objects resting even upon a less solid proof than that left by his sceptical antagonists. For they argued but the possibility of its non-existence, whereas he says its existence is suggested to us. Where's the difference? 'Tis true; he proceeds to invest this suggestion with the dignity and force of being a primary law of nature,—a supposition which any man's sense will reject, without my taking the trouble to disprove it eminently from the system of the Scotch philosopher himself."—Sulla Scuola Scozzese di Metafisica, Parte Prima: Opera di Giambattista Magalotti, Padova, 1824: vide Blackw. Mag., Aug. 1824, 227.

"La philosophie de Reid et de l'école écossaise est une philo-

sophie du sens commun; elle n'est susceptible d'aucune autre définition; elle n'est ni sensualiste, ni réfléchie, ni rationaliste; elle participe de chacun de ces systèmes pour autant qu'ils s'accordent avec le sens commun, mais elle-même forme moins un système, dont toutes les parties soient liées par un principe organique, qu'un ensemble de vérités détachées dont toute la liaison consiste dans leur conformité aux décrets du bon sens.

"Cette philosophie a d'incontestables mérites; elle a reconnu un grand nombre de vérités premières qui avaient été trop souvent niées ou absorbées dans les vues systématiques des doctrines antérieures; telles sont, par exemple, la distinction réelle de l'esprit et du corps, l'activité de l'âme à tous les dégrés de la connaissance, la nature diverse de la connaissance sensible ou contingente et de la connaissance rationnelle ou nécessaire, et les principes ou les axiomes de la philosophie. Reid a ainsi sanctionné, par l'opinion commune, la vérité relative du sensualisme et du rationalisme pur, en se gardant de leurs tendances et de leurs caractères exclusifs. Mais, au lieu de s'élever à un point de vue supérieur qui domine à la fois le sensualisme et la rationalisme pur, qui les complète l'un et l'autre et les transforme dans la doctrine harmonique de la science, il se place à un point de vue inférieur, où ces doctrines opposées se rencontrent également, mais sans se pénétrer et s'unir; il se place au point de vue, non de la raison absolue, mais du sens commun."—Essai théorique et historique sur la Génération des Connaissances humaines, par Tiberghien, Bruxelles, 1844: vide Blakey's Hist. of the Philos. of Mind, Lon., 1850, iii. 534–535. See, also, 157, 187, 208, 427, 533; i. 89; ii. 242, 245; iv. 40.

"It may be here remarked that what Malebranche has properly called the judgment of the mind as to the cause of its sensations, is precisely what Reid denominates perception; a term less clear, and which seems to have led some of his school into important errors. The language of the Scottish philosopher appears to imply that he considered perception as a distinct and original faculty of the mind, rather than what it is, a complex operation of the judgment and memory, applying knowledge already acquired by experience. Neither he nor his disciple Stewart, though aware of the mistakes that have arisen in this province of metaphysics by selecting our instances from the phenomena of vision instead of the other senses, have avoided the same source of error."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 326. See, also, 327, n., ii. 433, 442, n.

It is only just to allow Stewart to be heard in explanation of his master's doctrine of Perception:

"To what then, it may be asked, does this statement amount? Merely to this: that the mind is so formed that certain impressions produced on our organs of sense by external objects are followed by correspondent sensations, and that these sensations (which have no more resemblance to the qualities of matter than the words of a language have to the things they denote) are followed by a perception of the existence and qualities of the bodies by which the impressions are made; that all the steps of this process are equally incomprehensible; and that, for any thing we can prove to the contrary, the connection between the sensation and the perception, as well as that between the impression and the sensation, may be both arbitrary; that it is therefore by no means impossible that our sensations may be merely the occasions on which the correspondent perceptions are excited; and that, at any rate, the consideration of these sensations, which are attributes of mind, can throw no light on the manner in which we acquire our knowledge of the existence and qualities of body. From this view of the subject it follows that it is the external objects themselves, and not any species or images of the objects, that the mind perceives; and that, although by the constitution of our nature certain sensations are rendered the constant antecedents of our perceptions, yet it is just as difficult to explain how our perceptions are obtained by their means, as it would be upon the supposition that the mind were all at once inspired with them, without any concomitant sensations whatever."—Stewart's Works, ii. 111, 112.

But Reid's doctrine of Perception has been most strangely misunderstood and misrepresented by his later commentators, as is conclusively shown by the latest and the greatest. To his annotations the student has already been referred; but we shall oblige him by quoting a few lines which bear directly upon the point under consideration:

"Dr. Reid has many merits as a speculator, but the only merit which he arrogates to himself—the principal merit accorded to him by others—is that he was the first philosopher, in more recent times, who dared, in his doctrine of immediate perception, to vindicate, against the unanimous authority of philosophers, the universal conviction of mankind. But this doctrine he has at best imperfectly developed, and, at the same time, has unfortunately obscured it by errors of so singular a character that some acute philosophers—for Dr. Brown does not stand alone [Priestley, Gleig, Beasley, and others are subsequently named; vide p. 298]—have never even suspected what his doctrine of perception actually is. In my last Lecture, [XXIII.,] having concluded the review of Reid's Historical Account of Opinions on Perception, and of Brown's Attack upon that account, [see Brown's Lects. on the Philos. of the Human Mind, Lects. XXV., XXVI.,] I proceeded to the question,—Is Reid's own doctrine of perception a scheme of Natural Realism? that is, did he accept in its integrity the dictum of consciousness,—that we are immediately cognitive both of the phenomena of matter and of the phenomena of mind? or did he, like Brown, and the greater number of more recent philosophers, as Brown assumed, hold only the finer form of the representative hypothesis, which supposes that, in perception, the external reality is not the immediate object of consciousness, but that the ego is only determined in some unknown manner to represent the non-ego, which representation, though only a modification of mind, or self, we are compelled by an illusion of our nature, to mistake for a modification of matter, or not-self? I stated to you how on the determination of this question depended nearly the whole of Reid's philosophical reputation; his philosophy professes to subvert the foundations of idealism and scepticism, and it is as having accomplished what he thus attempted, that any principal or peculiar glory can be awarded to him. But if all he did was merely to explode the cruder hypothesis of representation, and to adopt in its place the finer,—why, in the first place, so far from depriving idealism and scepticism of all basis, he only placed them on one firmer and more obscure; and, in the second, so far from originating a new opinion, he could only have added one to a class of philosophers who, after the time of Arnauld, were continually on the increase, and who, among the contemporaries of Reid himself, certainly constituted the majority. His philosophy would thus be at once a silly blunder; its pretence to originality only in proclamation of ignorance; and, so far from being an honour to the nation from which it arose and by whom it was respected, it would, in fact, be a scandal and a reproach to the philosophy of any country in which it met with any milder treatment than derision. . . . I then detailed to you the grounds on which it ought to be held that Reid's doctrine of Perception is one of Natural Realism, and not a form of Cosmothetic Idealism, as supposed by Brown. . . . Having concluded the argument by which I endeavoured to satisfy you that Reid's doctrine is Natural Realism, I should now proceed to show that Natural Realism is a more philosophical doctrine than Hypothetical Realism."—Sir Wm. Hamilton's Lects. on Metaphysics, Lects. XIII., XXIV., Bost., 1859, 155, 327, 329.

In the second edition (1857) of his Biographical History of Philosophy, Mr. Lewes remarks,

"Since the first edition of this work, Sir W. Hamilton has published an edition of Reid, illustrated and enriched by notes and dissertations of incomparable erudition and acuteness. Respecting the interpretation Sir William gives to Reid's doctrines, I will only say that he has shown what a subtle mind can read into the philosophy of common sense; but he has not in the least produced the conviction in me of Reid's having meant what the illustrious successor supposed him to have meant. At the same time, I will add that, the limits of my work having restricted me to the consideration of Reid's contributions to Philosophy, (in the narrow sense of the term,) I have not done justice to his many excellent qualities as a teacher. His works are well worthy of diligent study, and their spirit is eminently scientific."—p. 629.

Surely the perplexed tyro may well ask, with the doubter of old, "What is truth?" Stewart labours with the friendly zeal of a disciple and a convert to enable us to understand Reid; Priestley, Gleig, Beasley, and Brown endeavour to prove that Reid did not understand himself; Sir William Hamilton says that these acute philosophers "have never even suspected what Reid's doctrine actually is;" and now Mr. Lewes avows his disbelief of Reid's having meant what Sir William Hamilton "supposed him to have meant"! Our own discretion in referring the reader to Reid himself, and to his commentators, instead of attempting to present a synopsis of his philosophy ourselves, will hardly be questioned.

We know not what the reader will think of us when we add to the above that the "chaste and simple diction" of Reid has been commended to the imitation of the student; but a moment's thought will suffice to satisfy us that these qualities of style are not inconsistent with obscurity of sentiment. Whether, however, "the ease, perspicuity, and purity of style" which Mr. Stewart claims for his "guide, philosopher, and friend" will be so readily allowed, we leave to the decision of the reader.

It will readily be believed, again to quote Sir William, that "There is a great want of precision in Reid's account of Perception and Sensation. . . . Reid cannot escape censure for ambiguity and vagueness."—Lects. on Metaphysics, Lect. XXIV. 332, 333.

Sir William well remarks,

"That Reid, a distinguished philosopher, and even the founder of an illustrious school, could be so greatly misconceived as that an eminent disciple [Dr. Brown] of that school itself should actually reverse the fundamental principle of his doctrine,—this may excite your wonder, but it ought not to move you to disparage either the talent of the philosopher misconceived or of the philosopher misconceiving. It ought, however, to prove to you the permanent importance, not only in speculation, but in practice, of precise thinking. You ought never to rest content, so long as there is aught vague or indefinite in your reasonings,—so long as you have not analyzed every notion into its elements, and excluded the possibility of all lurking ambiguity in your expressions. One great, perhaps the one greatest, advantage resulting from the cultivation of Philosophy, is the habit it induces of vigorous thought; that is, of allowing nothing to pass without a searching examination, either in your own speculations, or in those of others. We may never, perhaps, arrive at truth, but we can always avoid self-contradiction."—Ibid., Lect. XXIII. 325.

"In comparing Dr. Reid's publications at different periods of his life, it is interesting to observe his growing partiality for the aphoristical style. Some of his 'Essays on the Intellectual and Active Powers of Man' are little more than a series of detached paragraphs, consisting of leading principles, or aphorisms, of which the reader is left to trace the connection by his own sagacity."—DUGALD STEWART: Memoir of Reid.

In his travels in Asia and Africa he was an indefatigable inquirer and a close observer, and cast more light upon the geography and topography of those countries than any of his British predecessors. On his return to England, in 1782, he occupied himself with the preparation of those great works (vide infra) which embody the results of his learned investigations. 1. This work gives us the results of the collation of the log-books of many of the ships of war and Indiamen which had ploughed these great waters during the preceding thirty or forty years. The Wind and Current Charts and Sailing Directions of Dr. Maury (vide p. 1249, supra) have superseded Rennell's investigations.

Major Rennell also contributed valuable geographical and other papers to Phil. Trans., 1781, '91, '93, 1809, '15; Nic. Jour., 1798, (see Watt's Bibl. Brit.;) the Asiatic Researches and Register; and the Trans. of the Royal and Antiquarian Society. See Lon. Gent. Mag., June, 1830, 561, (Obituary;) Life of Sir J. Mackintosh, vol. ii. chap. ii., Journal, Aug. 24, 1811. The testimony of Gibbon to the eminent merits of our author has been cited above; and the reader may remember another quotation from the historian, on the same subject, in our life of John Pinkerton. To that article we also refer him for the titles of many valuable works on Travels, Voyages, and Geography. We have imagined the delight with which Rennell would peruse Rawlinson's Herodotus: how greatly, also, would he have enjoyed a few days and nights given to the grand geographical collection of Karl Ritter, (just deceased,) at this moment (May, 1860) offered for sale at Berlin!

Rennell, Thomas, D.D., Fellow of Exeter College, and Rector of Bishop's-Leighton, Devon. 1. Nature, &c. of Divisions; a Serm., Oxon., 1705, 4to. 2. Serms., 1 Cor. iii. 3, 4, 1705, 4to. 3. Serm., 1 Tim. ii. 1, 3, Lon., 1709, 8vo.

Rennell, Thomas, D.D., 1754–1840, grandson of the preceding; educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge; became curate of Barnack, and, in 1771, Preb. of Winchester, (resigned, 1797;) Rector of St. Magnus, London Bridge, 1792; Master of the Temple, 1797–1827; Dean of Winchester, 1805; Rector of Alton, Hants, 1809; Vicar of Barton Stacey, Hants, 1814. In 1786 he married the eldest daughter of Sir William Blackstone. He pub. a number of single Sermons, Lon., 1793–98, and in 1801 fourteen of his Discourses on Various Subjects were pub. collectively in an octavo volume. His Sermon on Gaming, 1794, 8vo, was commended in Pursuits of Lit. (Dial. III., Note 38) as "written with great energy, erudition, piety, patriotism, and eloquence;" and the same severe critic eulogizes his Sermon on the Services rendered to the English Nation by the Church of England, 1796, 8vo, as very able, learned, and eloquent, (Dial. IV., Note 160.) In 1798 his Commencement Sermon, (Ignorance productive of Atheism, &c.,) in which he exposed the true character of the French Revolution, gained for him from Mr. Pitt the title of "The Demosthenes of the Pulpit." The Rev. Sydney Smith, who reviewed his vol. of Sermons, (1801, 8vo,) in the Edin. Rev., Oct. 1802, (repub. in Smith's Miscell. Works, ed. 1854, i. 10–19,) whilst praising his Sermon on Gaming, blames him

"for having selected for publication so many sermons touching directly and indirectly upon the French Revolution. We confess ourselves long since wearied with this kind of discourses, bespattered with blood and brains, and ringing eternal changes upon atheism, cannibalism, and apostasy. . . . Dr. Rennell is apt to put on the appearance of a holy bully, an evangelical swaggerer, as if he could carry his point against infidelity by big words and strong abuse, and kick and cuff men into Christianity."—pp. 87–88.

"Well known for his learned and ingenious illustration of the truth, his energetic style of composition, and his firm and truly Christian adherence to the best principles and best doctrines."—Brit. Critic.

"Mr. Repton's Works consist of two folio and quarto volumes illustrated with numerous plates, which, when published, cost upwards of £25; but, by reducing the plates, and printing in a small type, the whole is got into an octavo volume, price 30*s.* The practical value of Mr. Repton's writings to the Landscape Gardener is universally known."—Advertisement.

"A highly acceptable work, from the pen of the tasteful Mr. Repton, enriched with practical notes by Mr. Loudon."—United Service Gazette.

"Repton's Works,—the works of one of the ablest and most experienced landscape-gardeners England can boast of,—from the high price at which they were originally published, have been hitherto inaccessible to the practical gardener, and even to the amateur proprietor of moderate means. They are now put, by Mr. Loudon, within the reach of both."—Scotsman.

Nor should we omit to notice a paper by Mr. Repton in Trans. Linn. Soc., 1810, vol. xi. p. 27, On the Supposed Effect of Ivy upon Trees. He left two vols. of MS. Recollections, and other unpublished papers.

Repton, John Adey, son of Humphry Repton, (q. v., Nos. 10 and 12,) and an architect, d. 1860, aged 86. He privately printed 80 copies of his romance Rhadapanthus, and contributed to Archæologia, Jour. Brit. Archæological Assoc., Lon. Gent. Mag., and Britton's Architectural Antiquities. See Lon. Gent. "Sir John Reresby was a staunch loyalist; his Memoirs are written in a lively, pleasant style."—Brydges's Cens. Lit.

"The Memoirs of Sir John Reresby belong to that rare and valuable class of works which appear to have been written not so much with any view towards fame or emolument, as for the private ends and satisfaction of the writer's themselves. . . . He relates the history of the times as a man might tell his story to his friend."—Lon. Retrospec. Rev., viii. 1823, 342–380, (q. v.)

Reyner, Clement, Secretary to the Congregation of the Benedictines. Apostolatus Benedictinorum in Anglia, sive Disceptatio historica de Antiquitate Ordinis Congregationisque Monachorum Nigrorum S. Benedicti in Regno Angliæ; cum Appendice copiosa instrumentorum venerandæ vetustatis, (Concordia Regularis S. Dunstani, Statuta Monastica Lanfranci, Acta Capitulorum, &c.,) 2 vols. in 1, folio; Duaci, 1626, 2 vols. in 1, fol.

Reyner is said to have profited by the collections of Dr. John Jones, Prior of St. Gregory's, and Father Augustin Baker: see BAKER, DAVID, supra; Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon., ii. 500, 604, iii. 14.

"But the chief of our historians of this order was Clement Reyner, whose elaborate book is entitled. . . . His business is to prove that the order was brought hither by Augustine, Archbishop of Canterbury; and he is thought to have fairly answered all the objections against it."—Bishop Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Lib., ed. 1776, 123.

Reyner's Apostolatus was answered by a brother Benedictine, (see BARNES, JOHN, supra:)

"This was very ill resented by those of the fraternity, and other members of the Roman church; and they had some reason to be angry at one of their own body's using the book more scurvily than any of the Protestant writers had done."—BISHOP NICOLSON: ut supra.

"Which [Barnes's answer] being esteemed a piece savouring of too much imprudence and contradiction, if not heresy, it was prohibited the reading by the brethren, and thrown aside among unlicensed and heretical books, and soon after had a reply published against it, which in some copies of the Apostolatus is put at the end, without a name to it, or any naming of Barnes."—Athen. Oxon., ii. 500.

Such copies—indeed, copies of any kind—of the Apostolatus are very rare. The work is of great value to the historical student.
